APPRECIATION

Marty Monkey stood on one hand. Timmy Turtle applauded, his flippers making a very satisfactory sound to the up-ended monkey.

"That's wonderful, Marty," said Timmy. "I wish I could do acrobatics like that!"

"Poo, that's nothing," said Marty. "Watch this!" And he leaped and cavorted about, doing somersaults and triple somersaults in the air. Then he stood on one finger!

"Boy," sighed Timmy Turtle, "If I could do that I'd try out for the school variety show!"

"Would you really?" asked Marty. "Golly, I didn't think I was that good! Thanks, Timmy, I'll do it!"

Timmy stood sadly and watched Marty race down the road to the schoolhouse. Suddenly he was aware of a beautiful sweet sound drifting toward him. A lovely melody filled the air, and Timmy twisted his head way out of his shell to see Norma Nightingale sitting high in the tree, pouring out her song. Timmy listened, enchanted. What a happy, happy sound! It was so beautiful and happy it made him want to cry. Abruptly the song stopped.

"Bravo, bravo!" shouted Timmy as loud as he could. "Bravo, Miss Nightingale, that was simply beautiful!"

Norma Nightingale was pleased. "Call me Norma," she said. "Would you like an encore?"

Timmy shouted yes, and was treated to a series of trills and soaring notes that seemed to split the skies. "Oh," moaned Timmy in delight, "Norma, do go down to the school and join the variety show! Let everybody hear your beautiful voice!" And the nightingale flew off.

A short time later Ragsy Rabbit came up and did his funny little dance and told some jokes, and Timmy laughed. Ragsy was so encouraged that he too trotted on down to the schoolhouse.

Timmy sighed a little sadly. "Why the sigh, Timmy?" asked his wise old grandfather.

"Oh, nothing," said Timmy, "Only sometimes I wish I were talented and could do things so I could go down and try out for the school variety show."

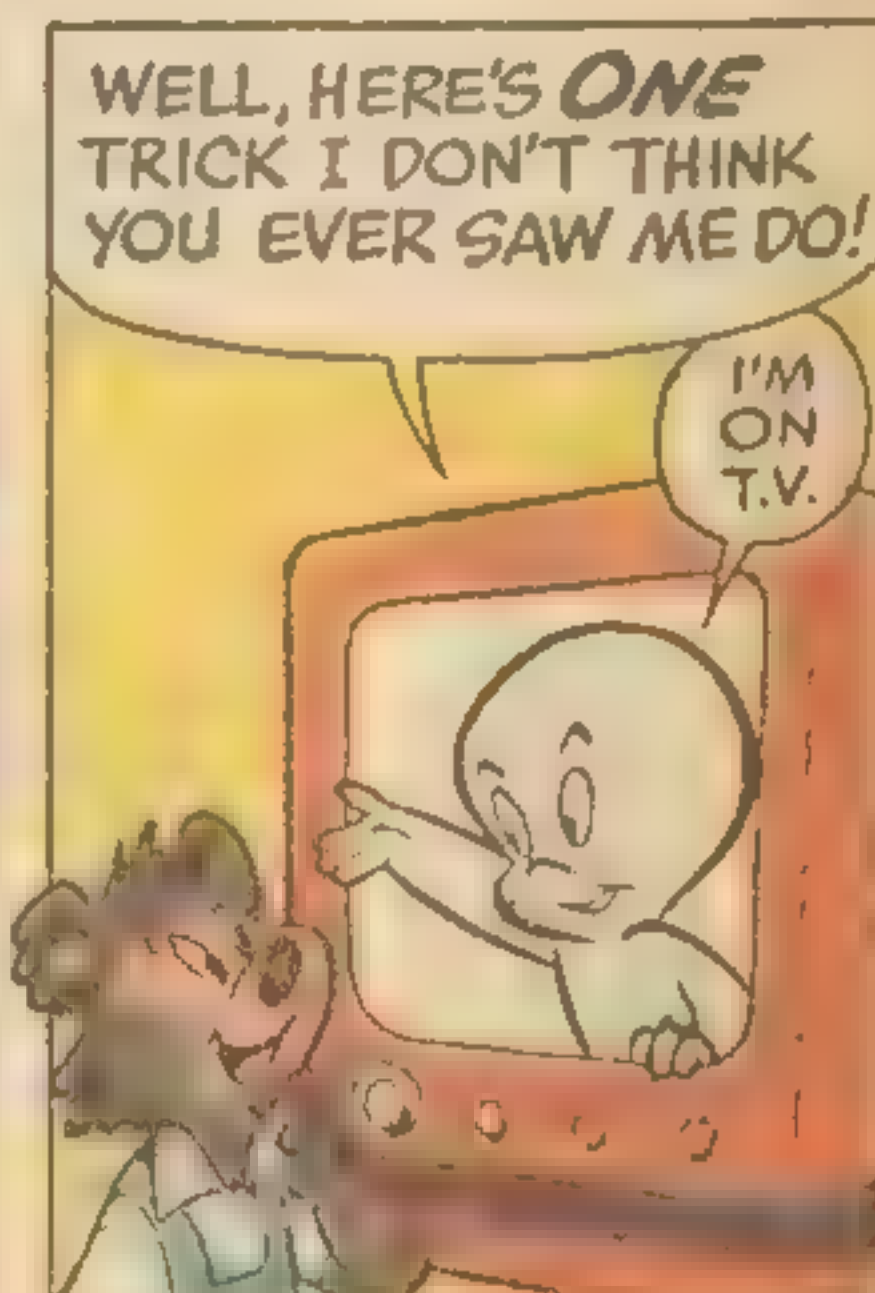

"What you have is just as important as talent," said his grandfather. "Without your gift talent would wither. I am referring to your wonderful APPRECIATION of the talents of others!"

"Really?" asked Timmy, his eyes beaming.

"Of course," said his grandfather. "What good is singing without someone to listen? What good is dancing without someone to watch? What good are jokes if no one laughs? You are important, my boy."

Timmy felt so much better he trotted right on down to the schoolhouse. "I want to be in the show!" he announced. "I want to be in the audience!"

CASPER, THE FRIENDLY GHOST

FOLLOW THE LEADER

Sheldon Sheep was a rebel. He just couldn't go along with the group. Nobody could tell where his independent strain came from, and none of the other sheep approved of it, but whenever the group moved from place to place, all the sheep and the shepherd constantly had to call Sheldon back to the fold.

The other sheep were easy to leave behind, but the shepherd was something else. Sheldon became very clever about eluding the usually alert shepherd, watching for the times when the lad was sleepy or busy with stragglers. Then he would slide quietly behind a rock or shrub till the flock was out of sight and he could go his own way in search of tasty flowers and succulent shrubs.

He couldn't for the life of him understand what kept the other sheep crowding together, pushing one another for the same blades of grass, following blindly in line for their periodic shearings. For him the joy in life was to wander alone, free, enjoying the cool breezes and the fragrance of the empty meadows.

Disgustedly, Sheldon watched from the rear as the shepherd coaxed the leader of the flock, a huge old ram, toward the gate of the pen. Obediently all the other sheep fell in behind the ram and passed through the gate.

Sheldon snorted to himself. "Sheep!" he muttered. "Go on . . . follow the leader! Soon you'll all be clipped like French poodles and shivering in the wind! Then you'll have a reason to huddle together!"

Sheldon hung back, watching the shepherd carefully. A huge cloud of dust rose from the milling flock. The shepherd rubbed his eyes with his fists, and in that instant, Sheldon was gone!

As fast as his little hoofs would carry him he raced out of sight behind some nearby boulders. Then more carefully he picked his way across a stream and up an unexplored pass. At last he was on his own, never more to be herded, to be bothered with following the flock, to be sheared of his beautiful, curly coat.

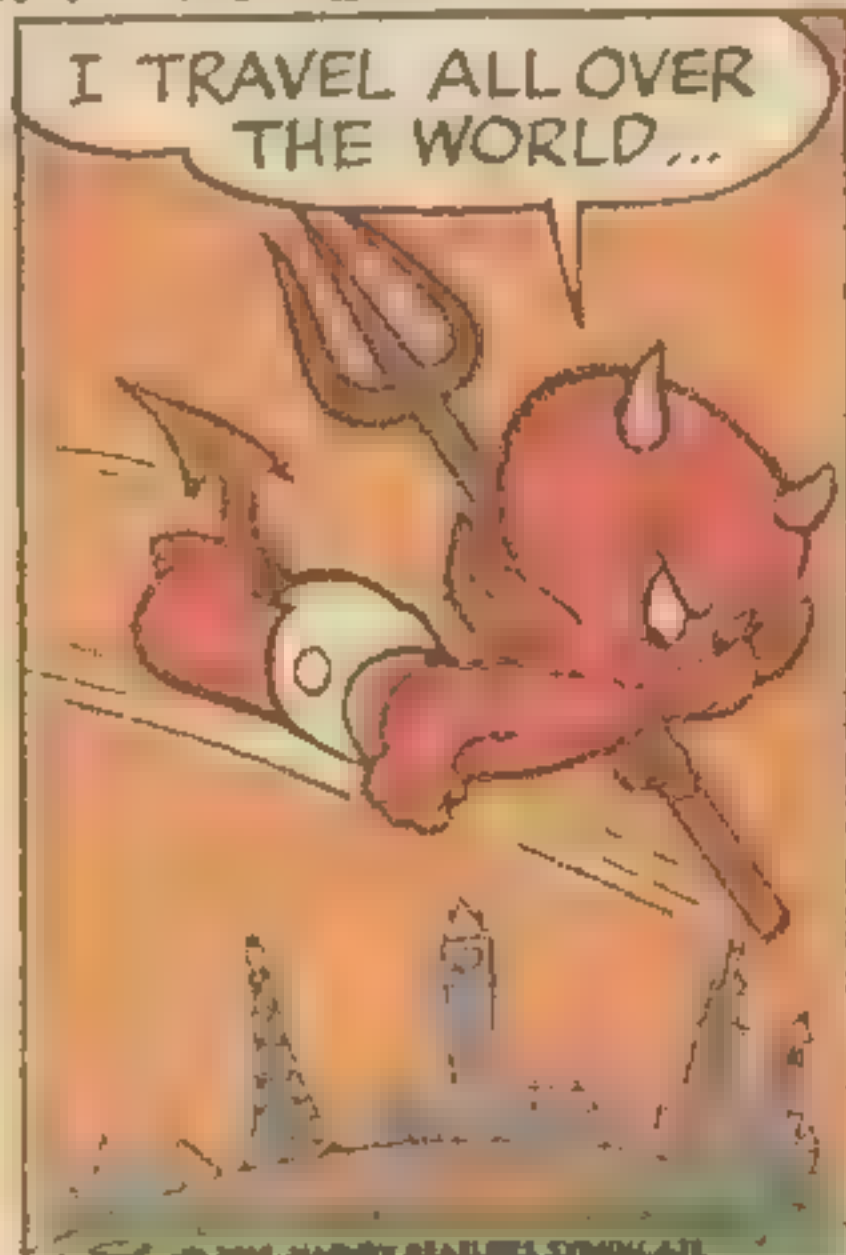

He wondered briefly if he would miss the other sheep. Then he fell to sampling the lovely green foliage in the pass. It was delicious. Soon he came to a broad meadow just filled with daisies, his favorite dessert.

"I would never have found this beautiful spot," he said to himself, "If I had been content to follow like a SHEEP!" He was proud of himself. "From now on if anyone asks me, I won't even admit I'm a SHEEP!"

Sheldon fell asleep. In his dreams he kept hearing the baas of the flock. He smiled contentedly to himself and opened his eyes. There were sheep all around!

"How did you find me?" Sheldon groaned. "How did you know where I was?"

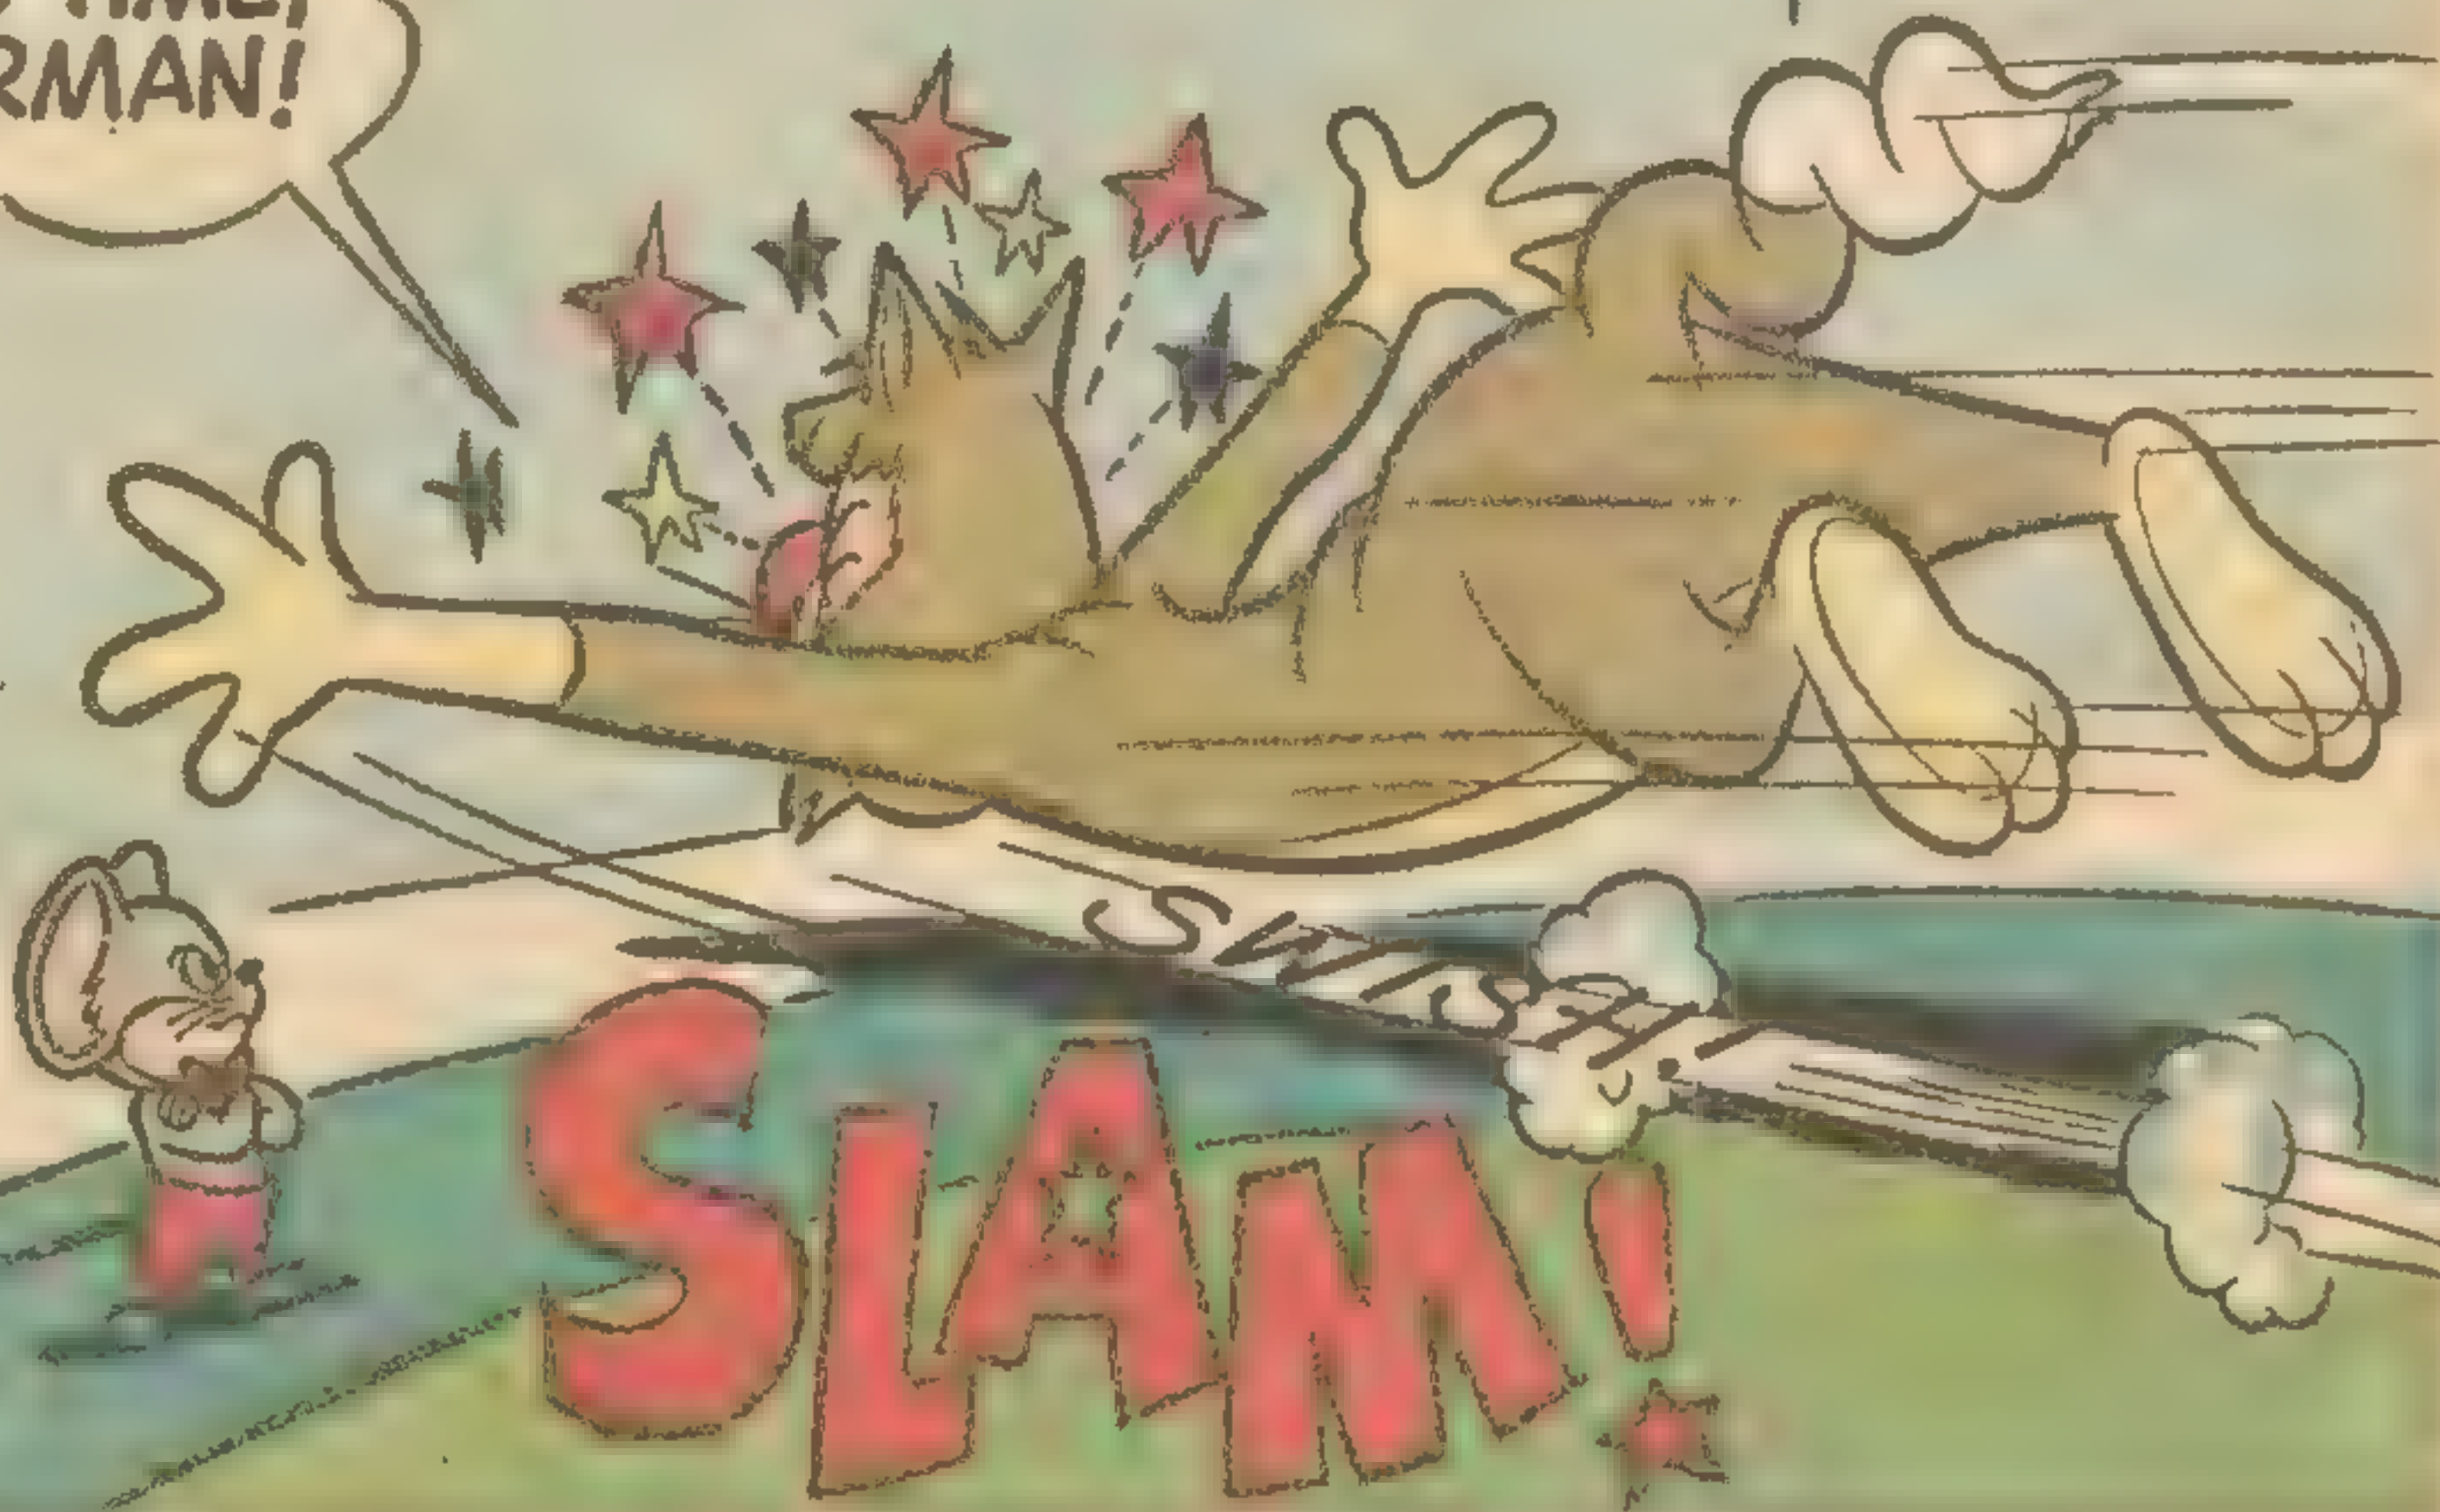

"We followed you!" said the other sheep. "Umm, the daisies are delicious! We've decided that from now on you're our new leader!"

BUZZY

in "SALES TALK"

DUM DE DUM DUM

"Who's there?" scowled the cat.

"Your entrance into the great world of knowledge!" said a voice from the other side of the door.

"What kind of jackass is that?" shouted the cat as he opened the door. "Oh, it's you!" he added as he noticed Buzzy, the crow, perched atop a line-up of books.

"Now, don't jump to any stupid conclusions," smiled Buzzy. "I've come here as a friend to do you a favor."

"Do you expect me to swallow that?" laughed the cat.

"Yes, sir," Buzzy said to himself. And out loud commented, "Sir, you shame me. I have nothing but the greatest admiration for you. You are intelligent, handsome, graceful and a pride to all catkind!"

"That's true," the cat blushed. "I didn't think you noticed it."

"How could anyone help but see it," Buzzy went on. "And therefore, my good sir, I want to help you become even greater."

The cat was still unimpressed. "Here," said Buzzy, and he pointed to the books, "wait a new world of growth. Look at these wonderful volumes. Books on every topic. A world of thrills and learning."

"Let me see one," asked the cat.

"Wouldn't you like to buy them without wasting time?" Buzzy asked with a worried look.

"NO!" was the answer, and Buzzy gulped as the cat picked out a big, fat one.

"Hey, I can't understand what it says!"

"Perhaps you're reading it upside down," suggested the crow.

The cat turned his head upside down. "Nope. Still can't make it out."

"Ah, my good sir, I see what's your trouble," smiled Buzzy. "You're having trouble with your eyesight. Let me ask you, what color am I?"

"Black, of course."

"Hah! Hah!" laughed the black crow, "Just as I thought. Sir, I am a deep shade of green!"

"You are?" questioned the worried cat.

"Oh, don't worry about it. I will send you at a slight extra charge a pair of glasses a la Buzzy that will straighten everything out for you. Now these eighty-two books and the pair of glasses will only cost you two hundred dollars!"

"Eighty-two books? It looks like there's only about twenty!"

"Remember your eyes!" said Buzzy, and he made out the bill.

While the cat went to get the money, Buzzy pushed the twenty books into the living room. "Hmm," he said. "The fool could use a book-case, too. Oh, well, enough's enough. After all, he's taking these foreign books off my hands, and one of these days I might want to sell him a dictionary!"

WENDY, THE GOOD LITTLE WITCH

Herman and Katnip

in

TRUCE STORY

Herman was getting tired of his daily chases with Katnip. "It's getting us nowhere," he told the other mice.

"But what can we do, Hoiman?" asked one of them.

"Just get me a piece of white American cheese and a stick," said Herman, "I'll take care of the rest."

So minutes later, Herman led a parade of mice out of the mouse-hole and into the middle of the living room floor. Herman was carrying the piece of American cheese on a stick.

"What's going on here?" roared Katnip when he saw the group.

"I carry a flag of truce," Herman said, pointing to the American cheese on a stick. "I come to talk peace."

"Well, I'll give you a minute to talk," said Katnip, sharpening his claws. "Then I want to get back into action."

"I believe we ought to sign a peace pact," Herman went on. "We're just getting ourselves tired. We won't bother you and you won't bother us."

Katnip seemed interested. He thought for a minute, a smile won over his face, and he finally said, "That's a good idea. Make up the pact. I'll sign."

Herman quickly got a pen and paper, and wrote out the details. He then wrote his name at the bottom, had all the mice sign theirs, and handed the paper and pen to Katnip.

"Never mind your pen," said Katnip as he took the paper, "I have my own."

The cat took his own pen, then stopped for a second. "How do you spell Katnip?" he asked.

They spelled it out slowly for him, and six letters later, the pact was legal. Each of them shook hands and the mice began to march back to their hole.

But suddenly from overhead there came an attack. It was Katnip! He leaped and grabbed all into his paws.

"But, Katnip!" screamed Herman. "Your signature is on our peace pact!"

"Not anymore, it's not!" laughed Katnip. "I used disappearing ink!"

Sure enough, there was nothing but a blank space where Katnip's name had been.

He was bringing the mice close to his mouth and...

"YEOOWWW!" screamed the cat.

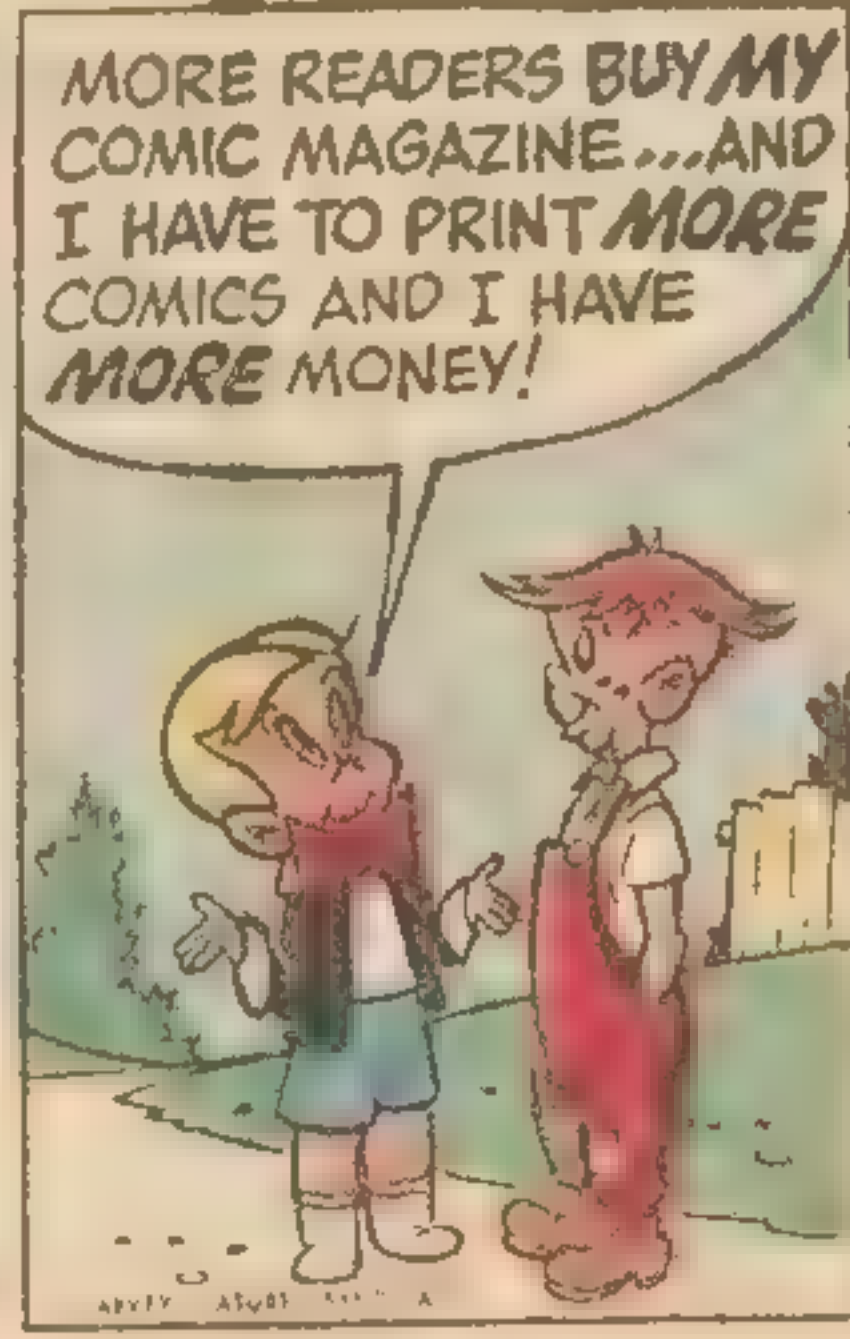

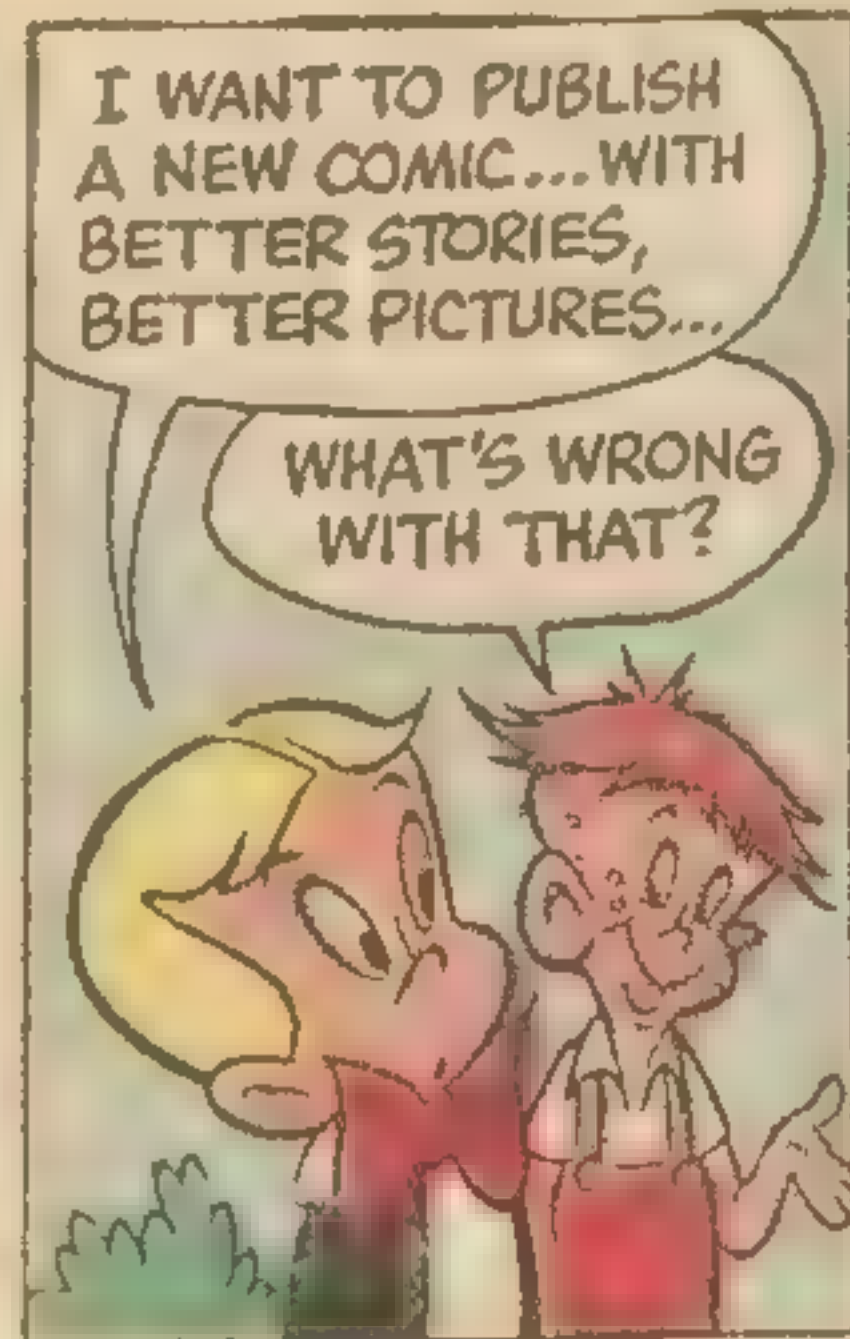

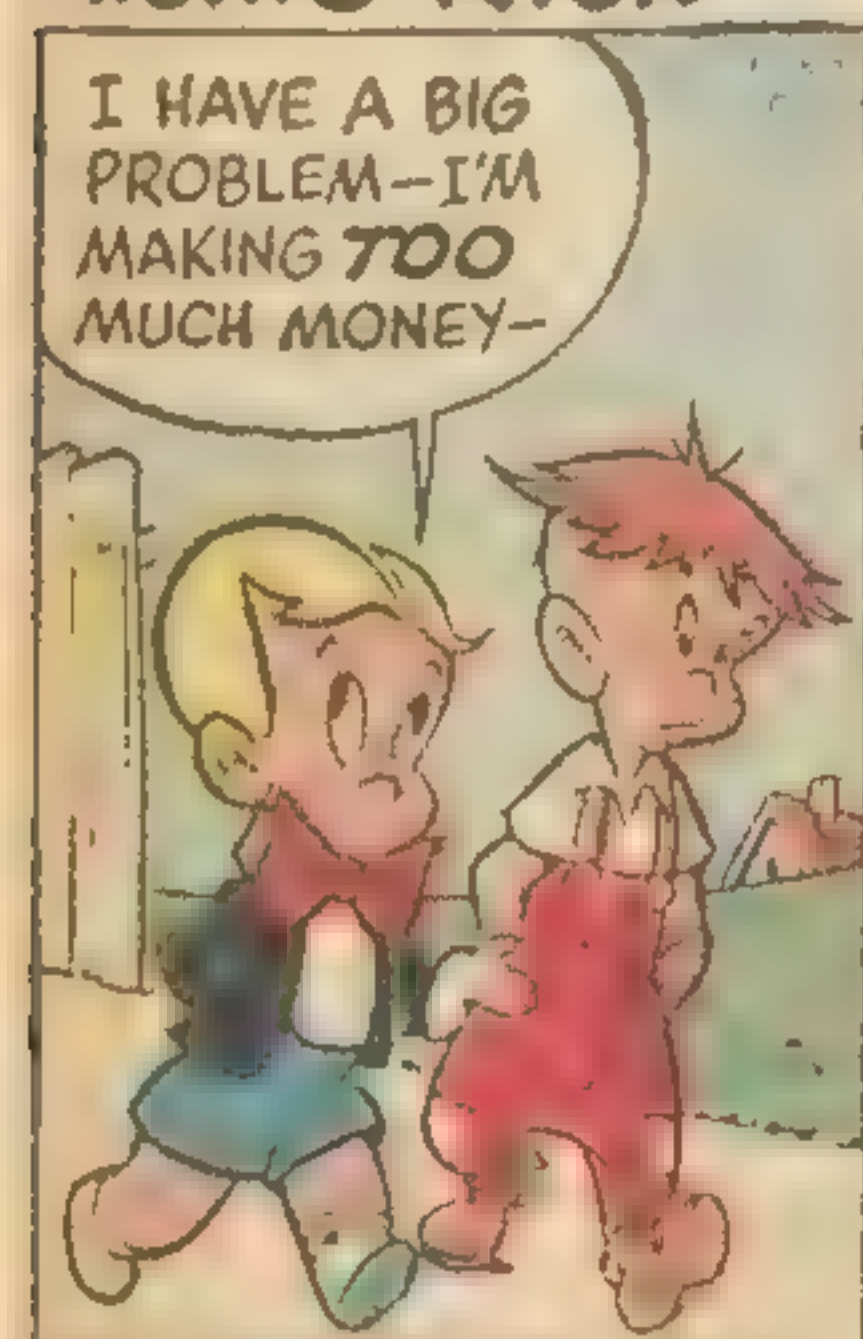

Herman had used the truce flag as a spear. The pain caused Katnip to drop the mice, and they scurried away.

But they were back seconds later with reinforcements... in the shapes of eggs, egg-beaters, rolling pins, pots and pans, and they proceeded to make mince pie out of Katnip!

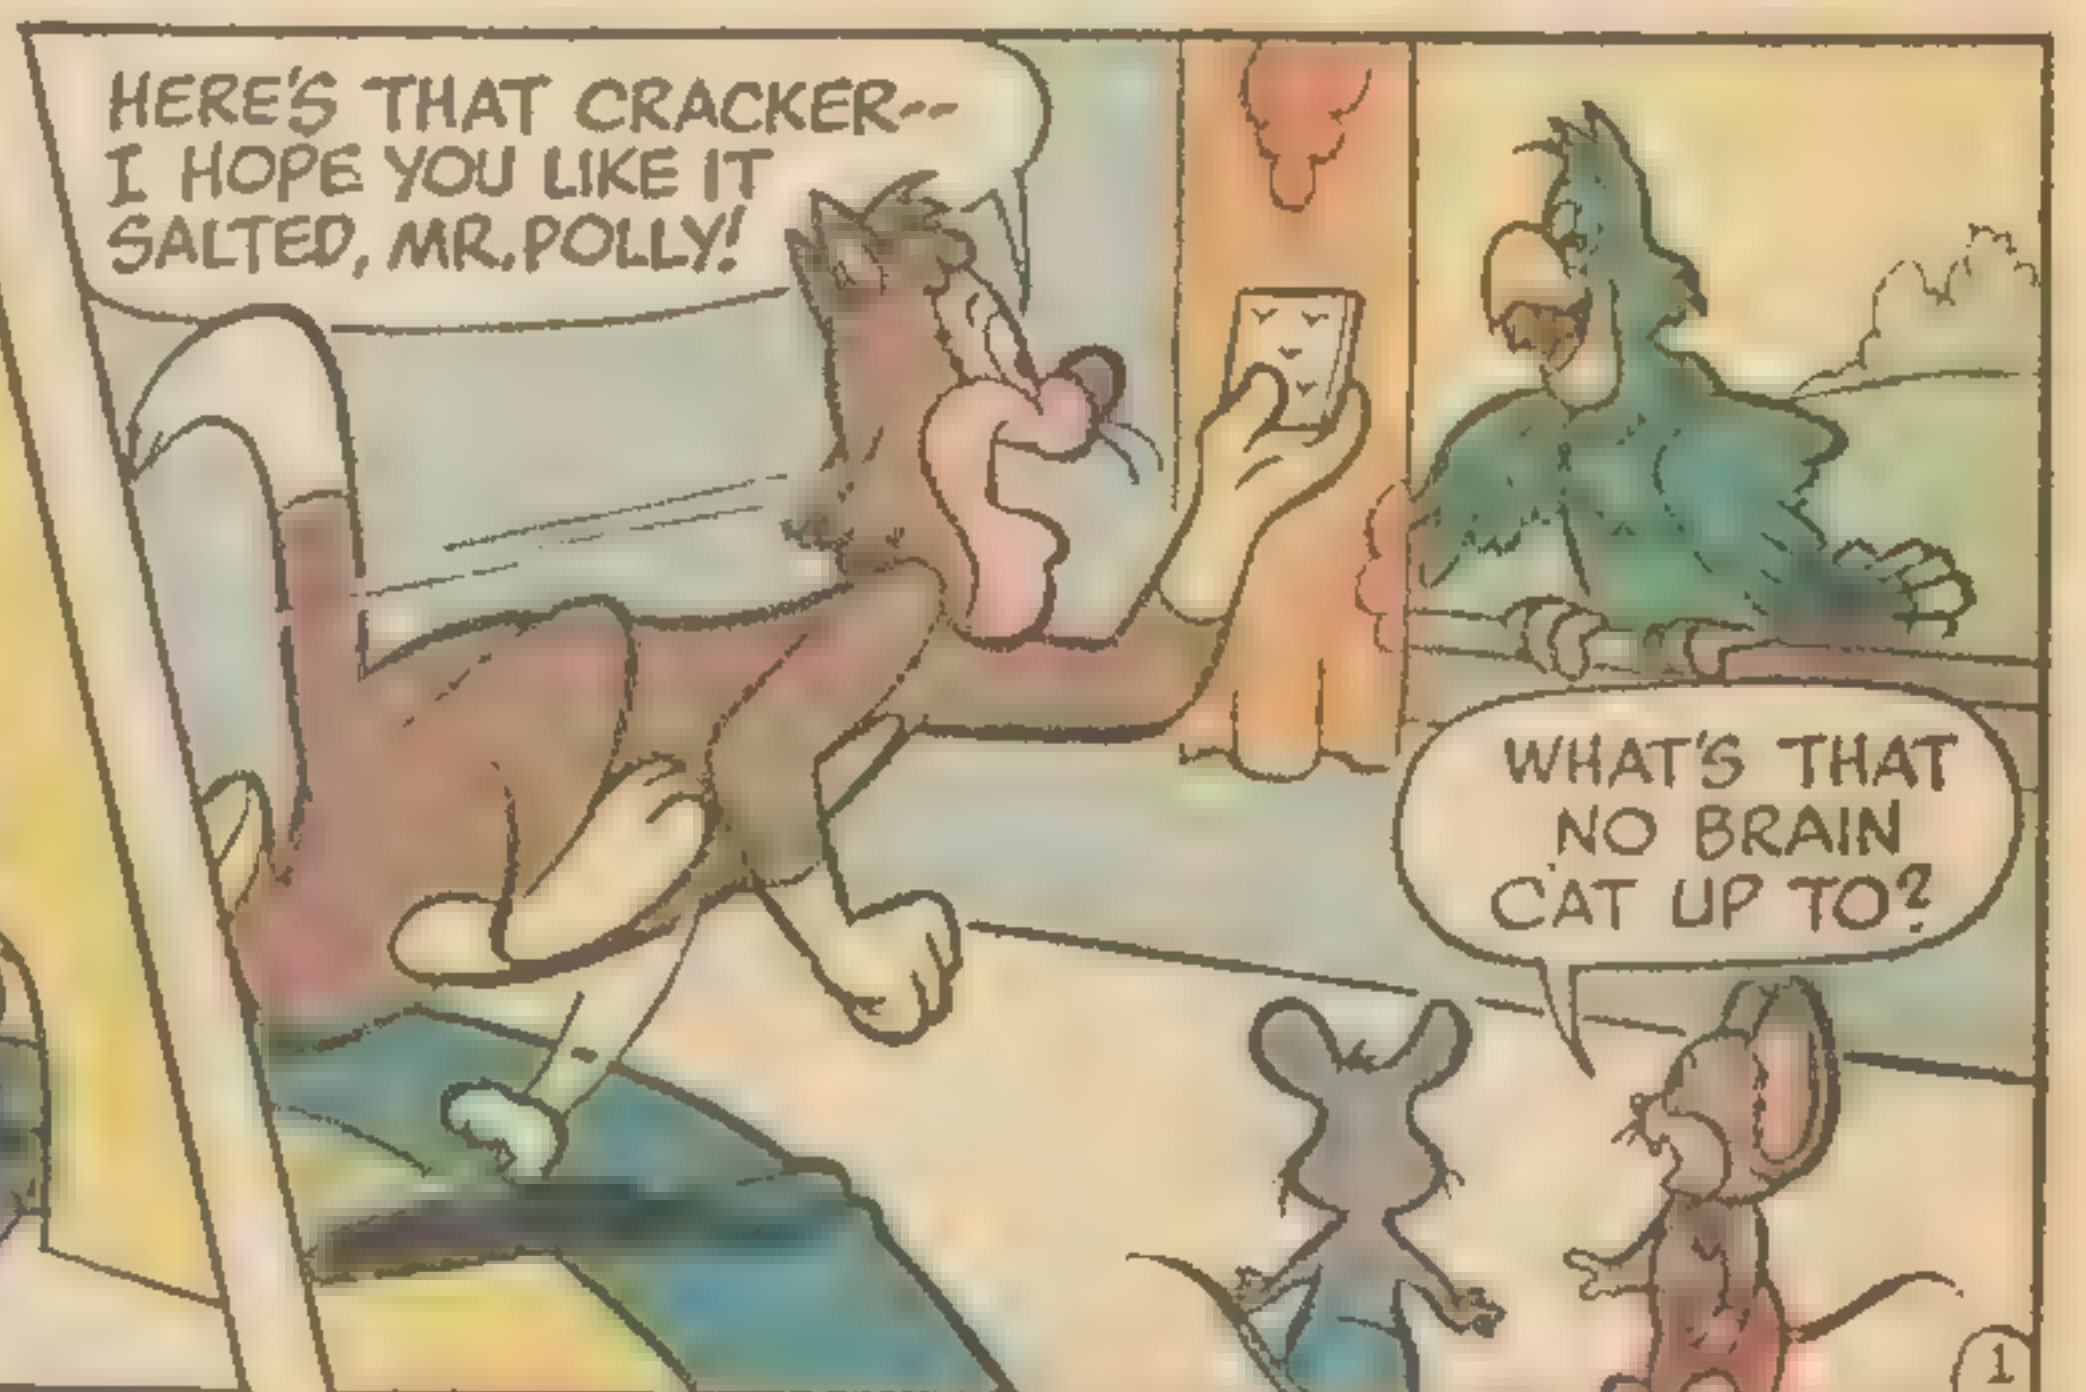

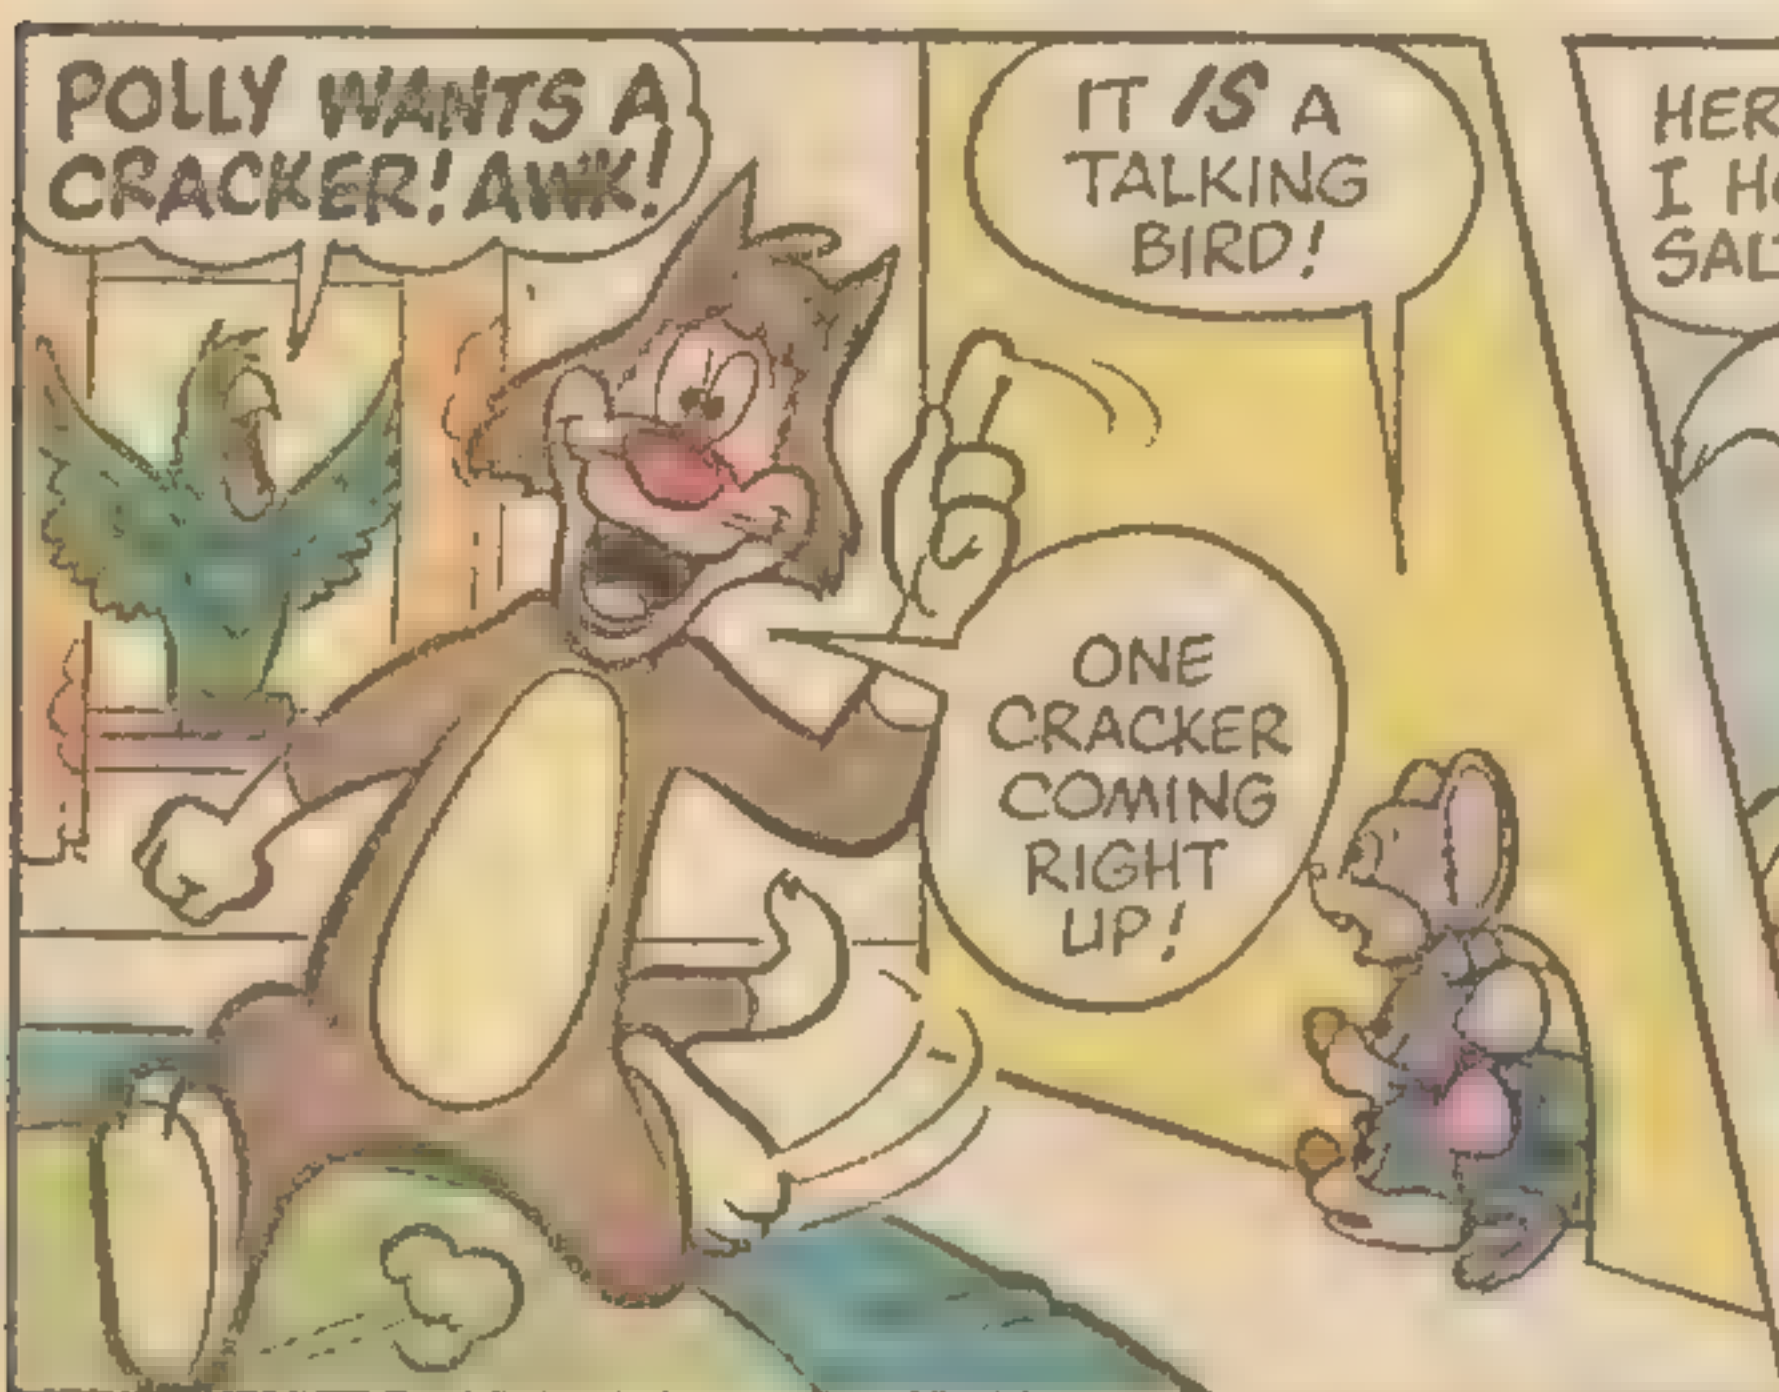

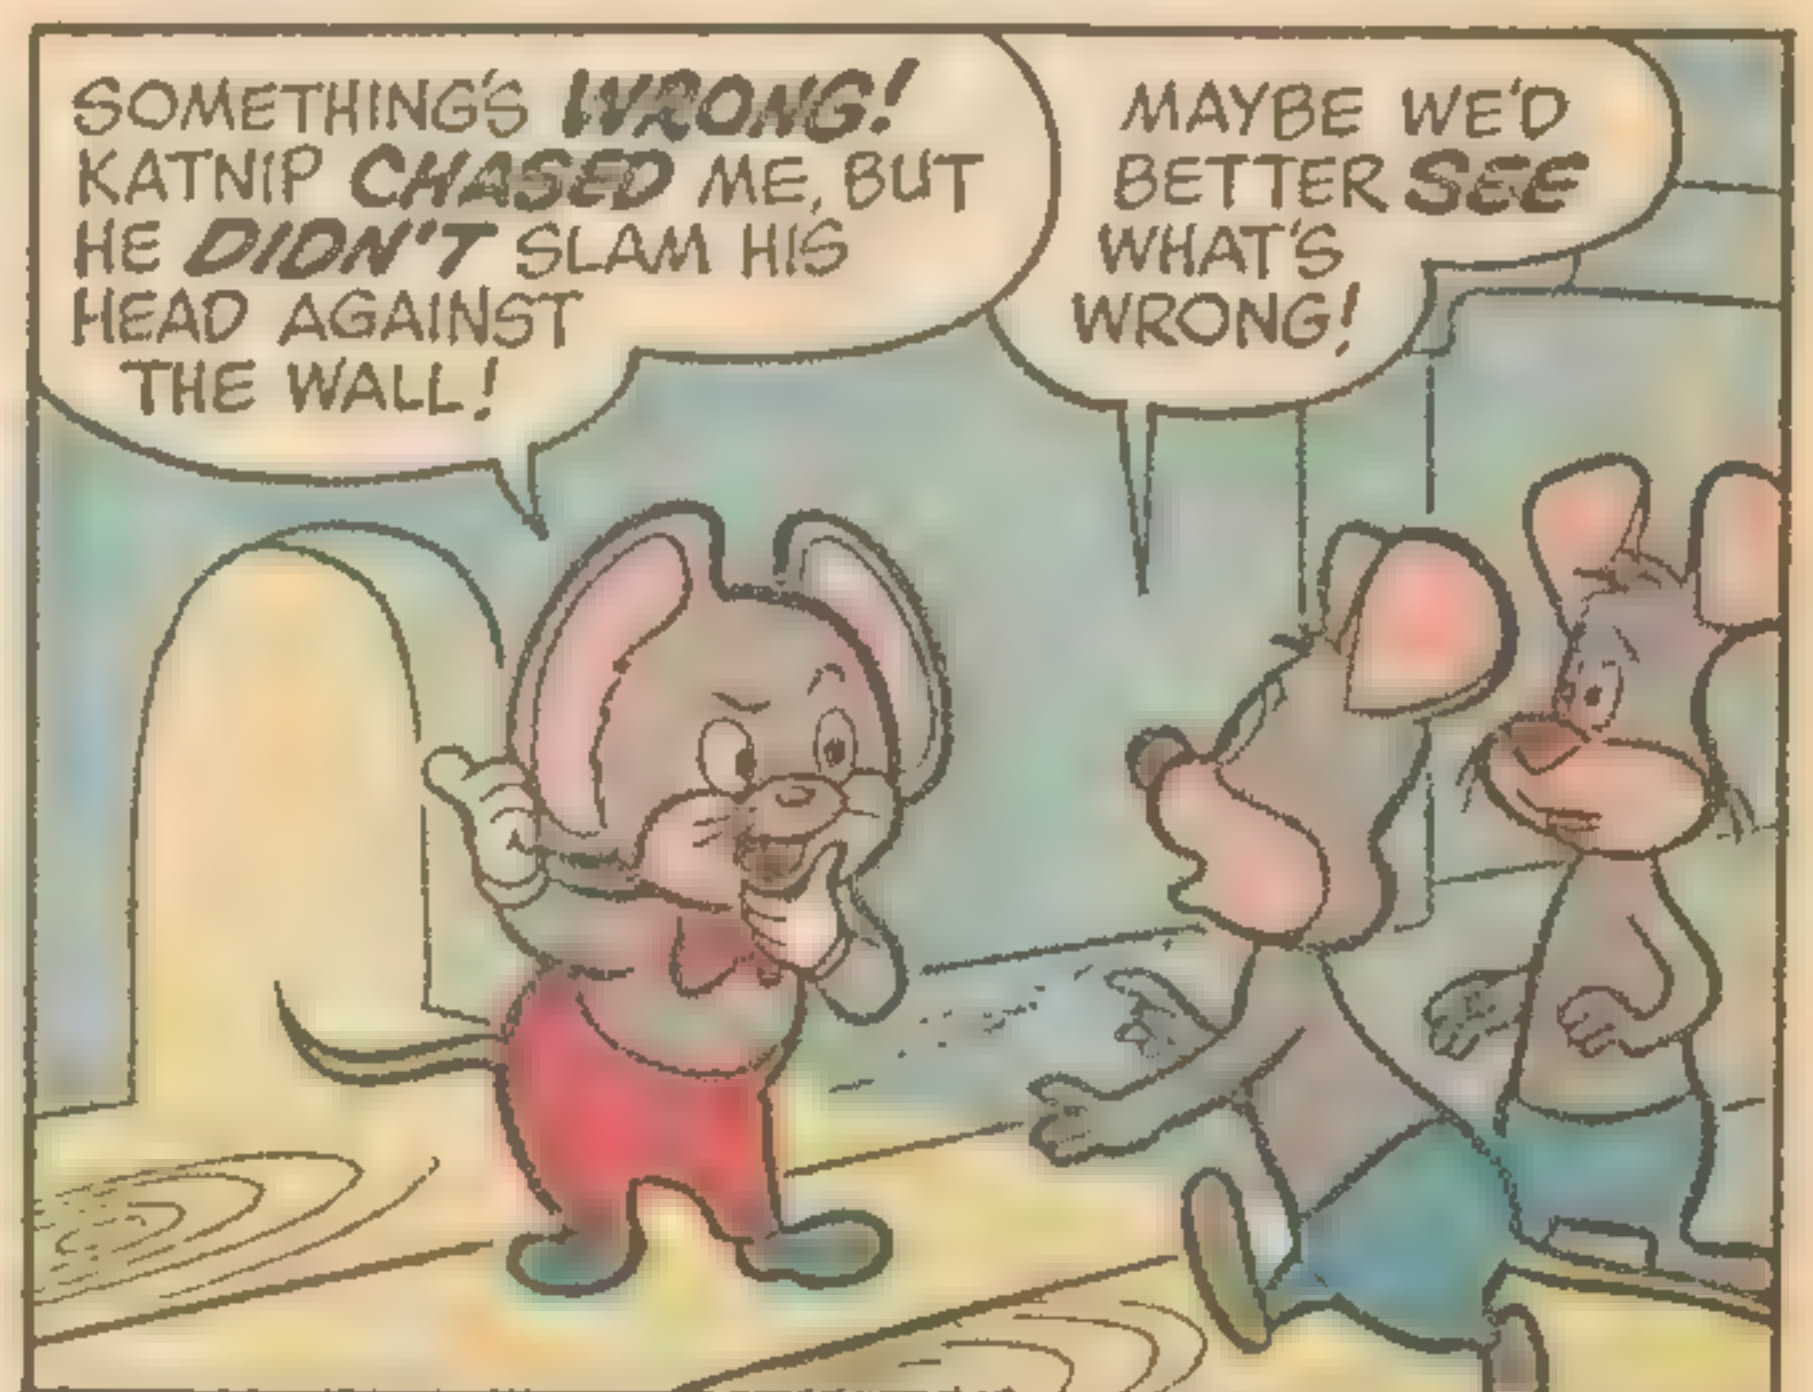

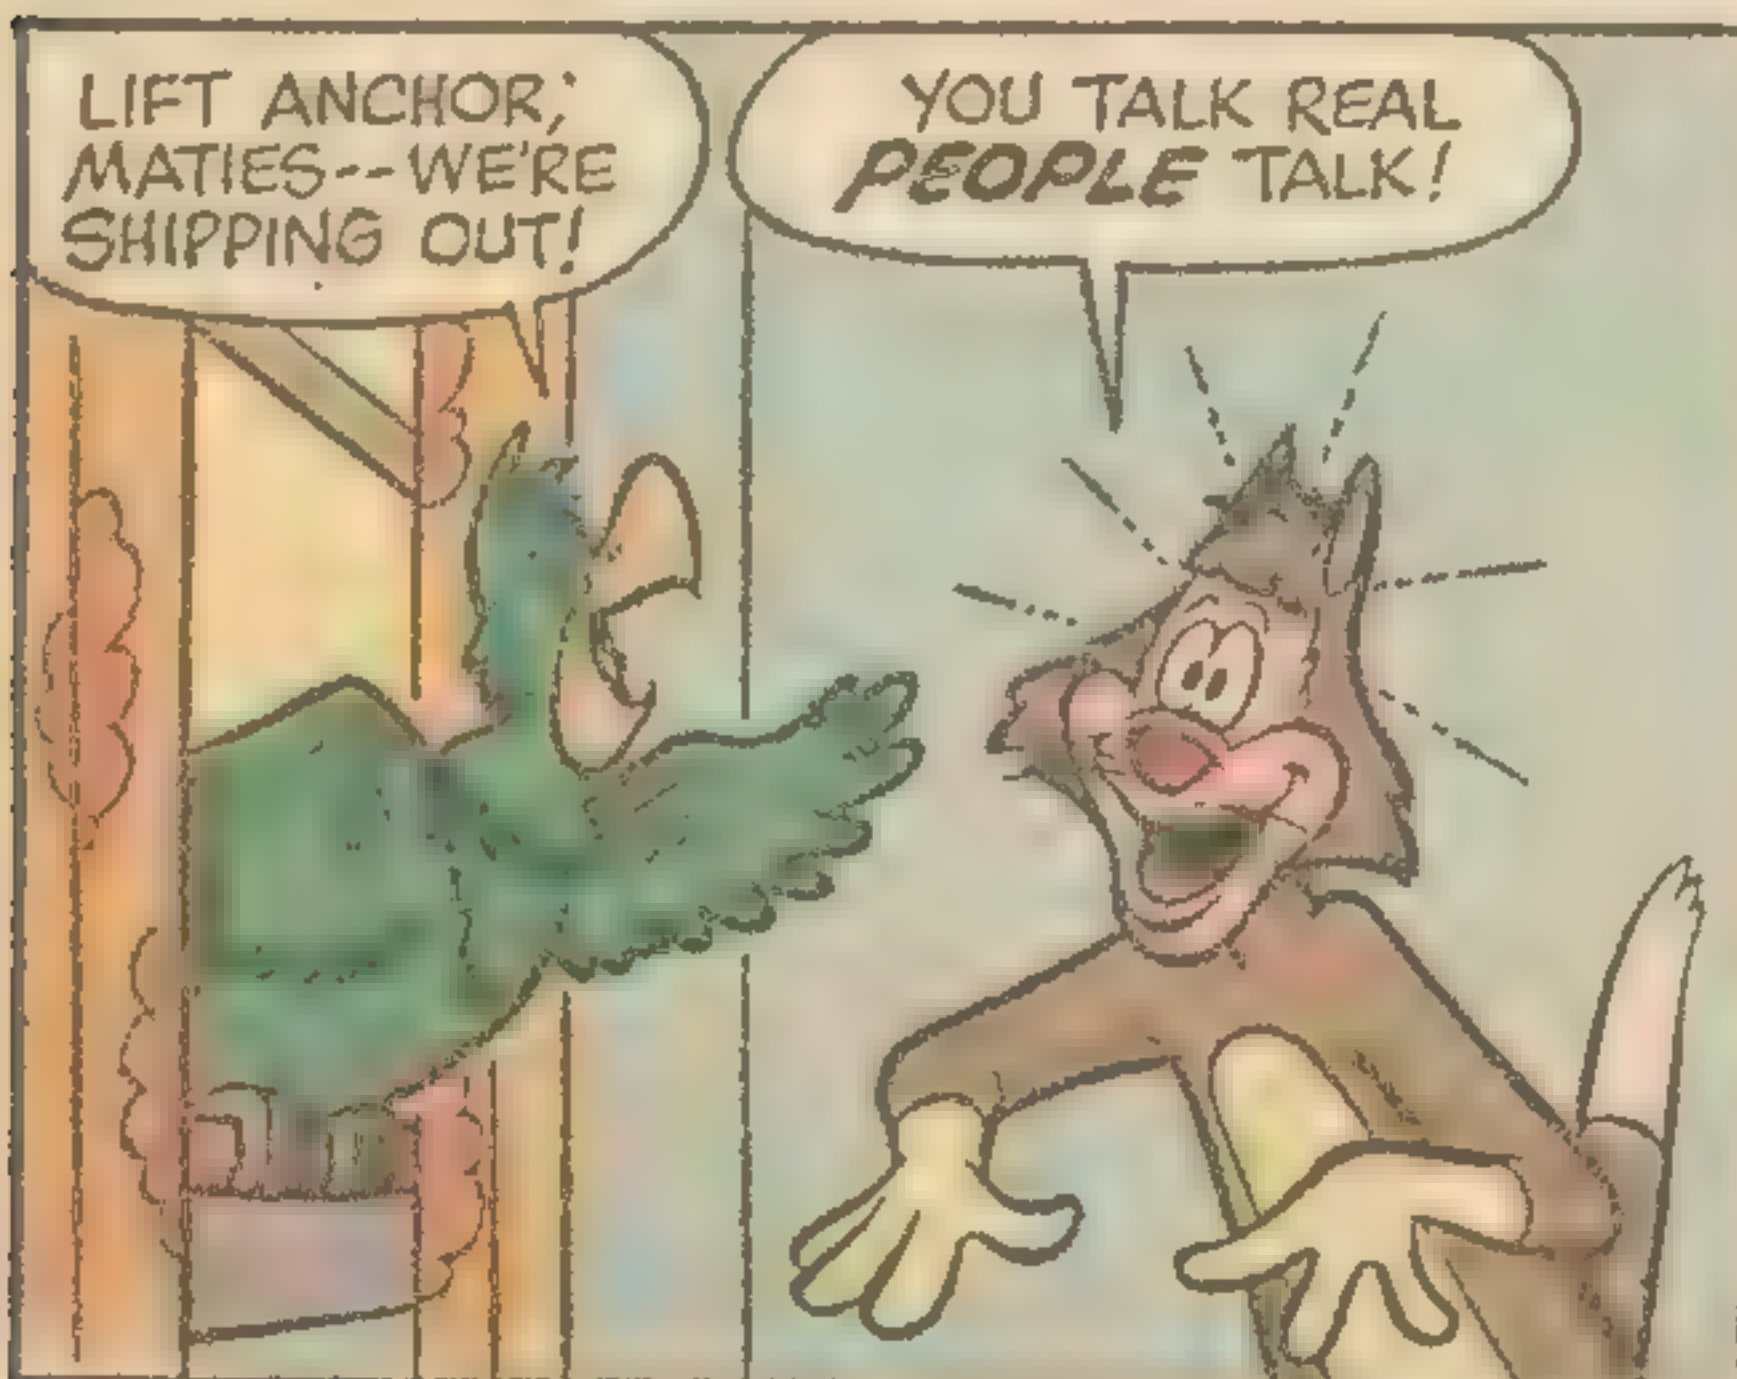

"Okau! Okay!" begged the well-beaten cat. "Let's have peace! I'll sign the peace pact."

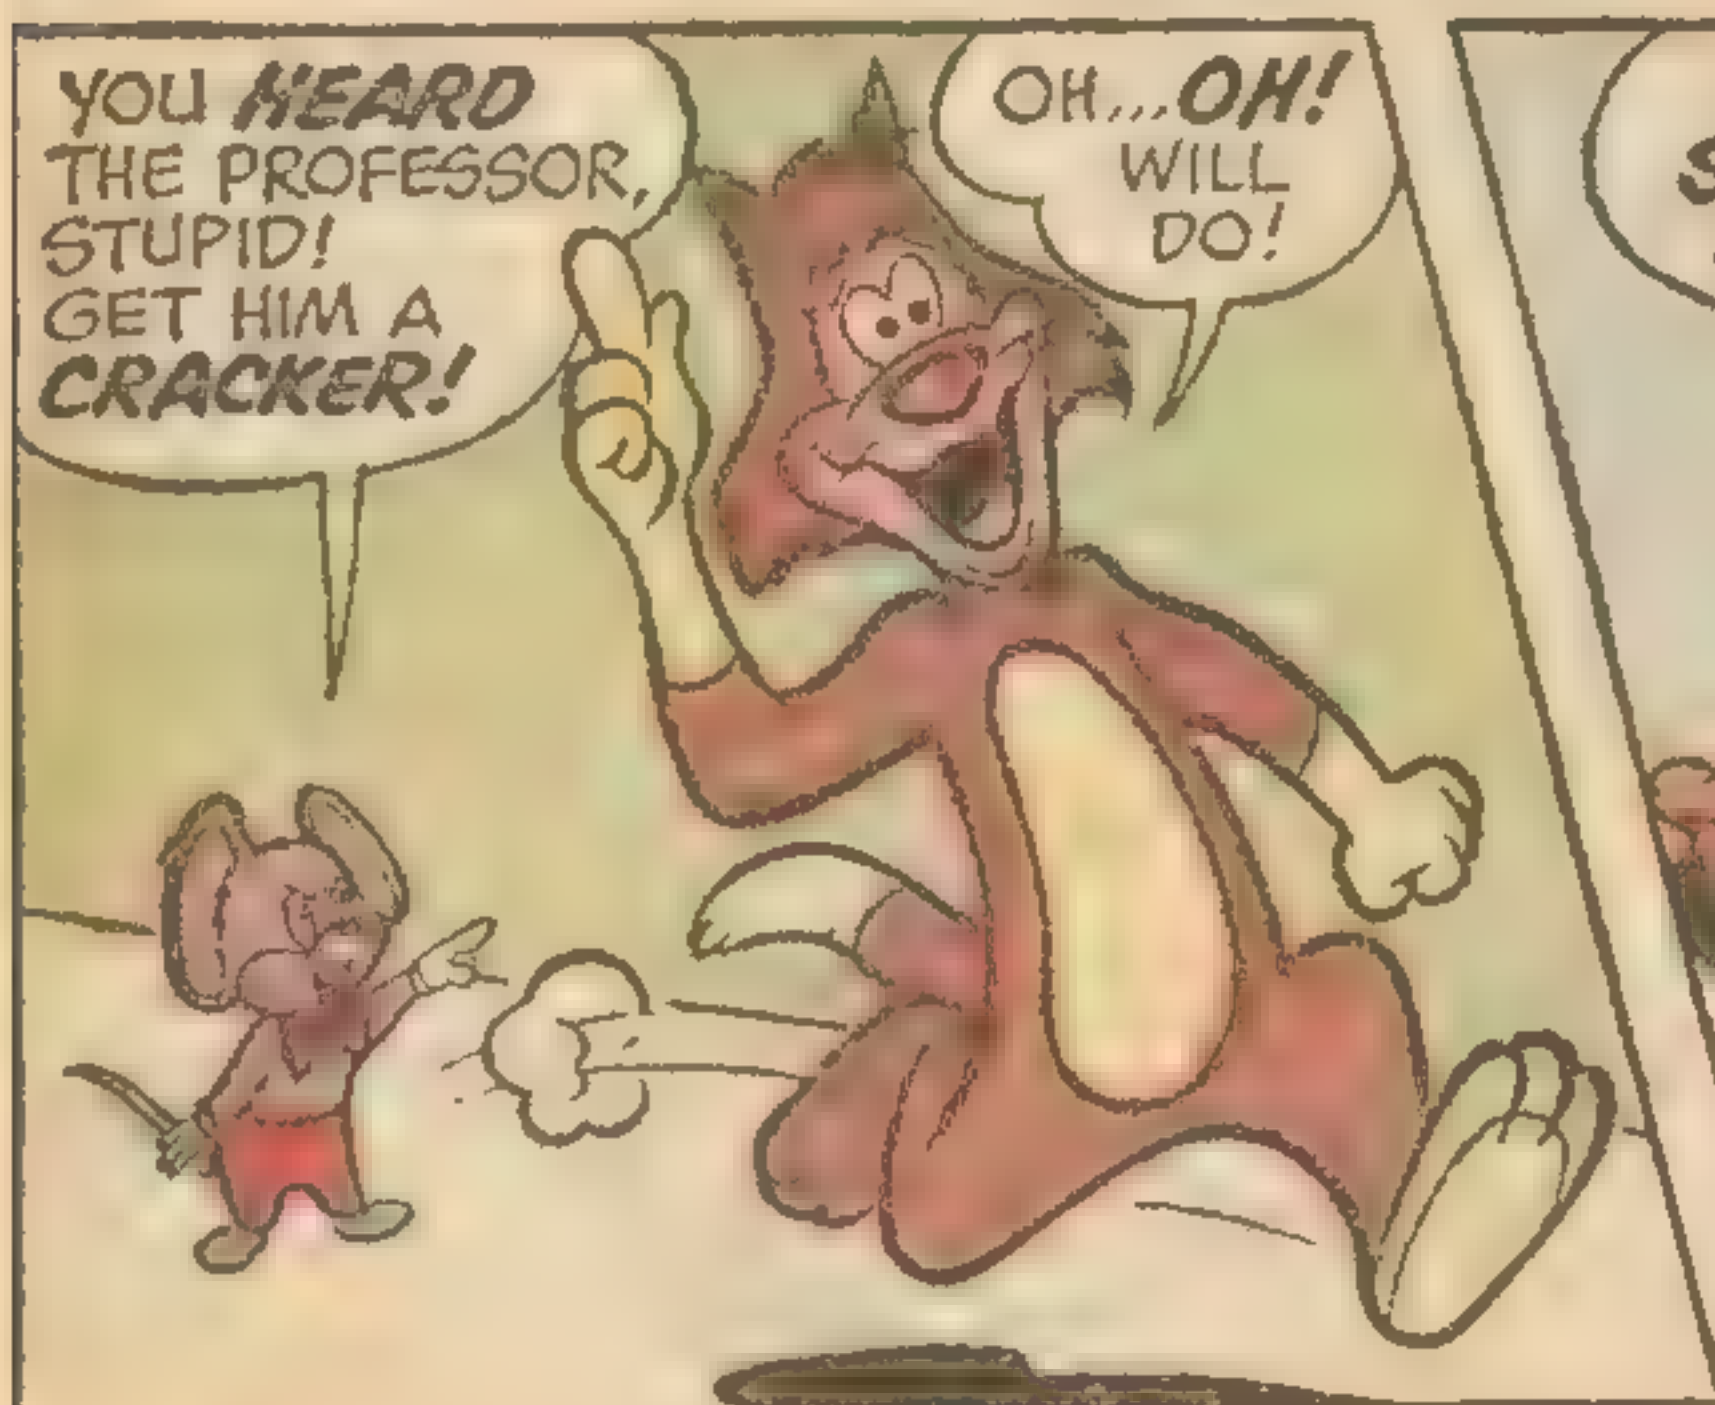

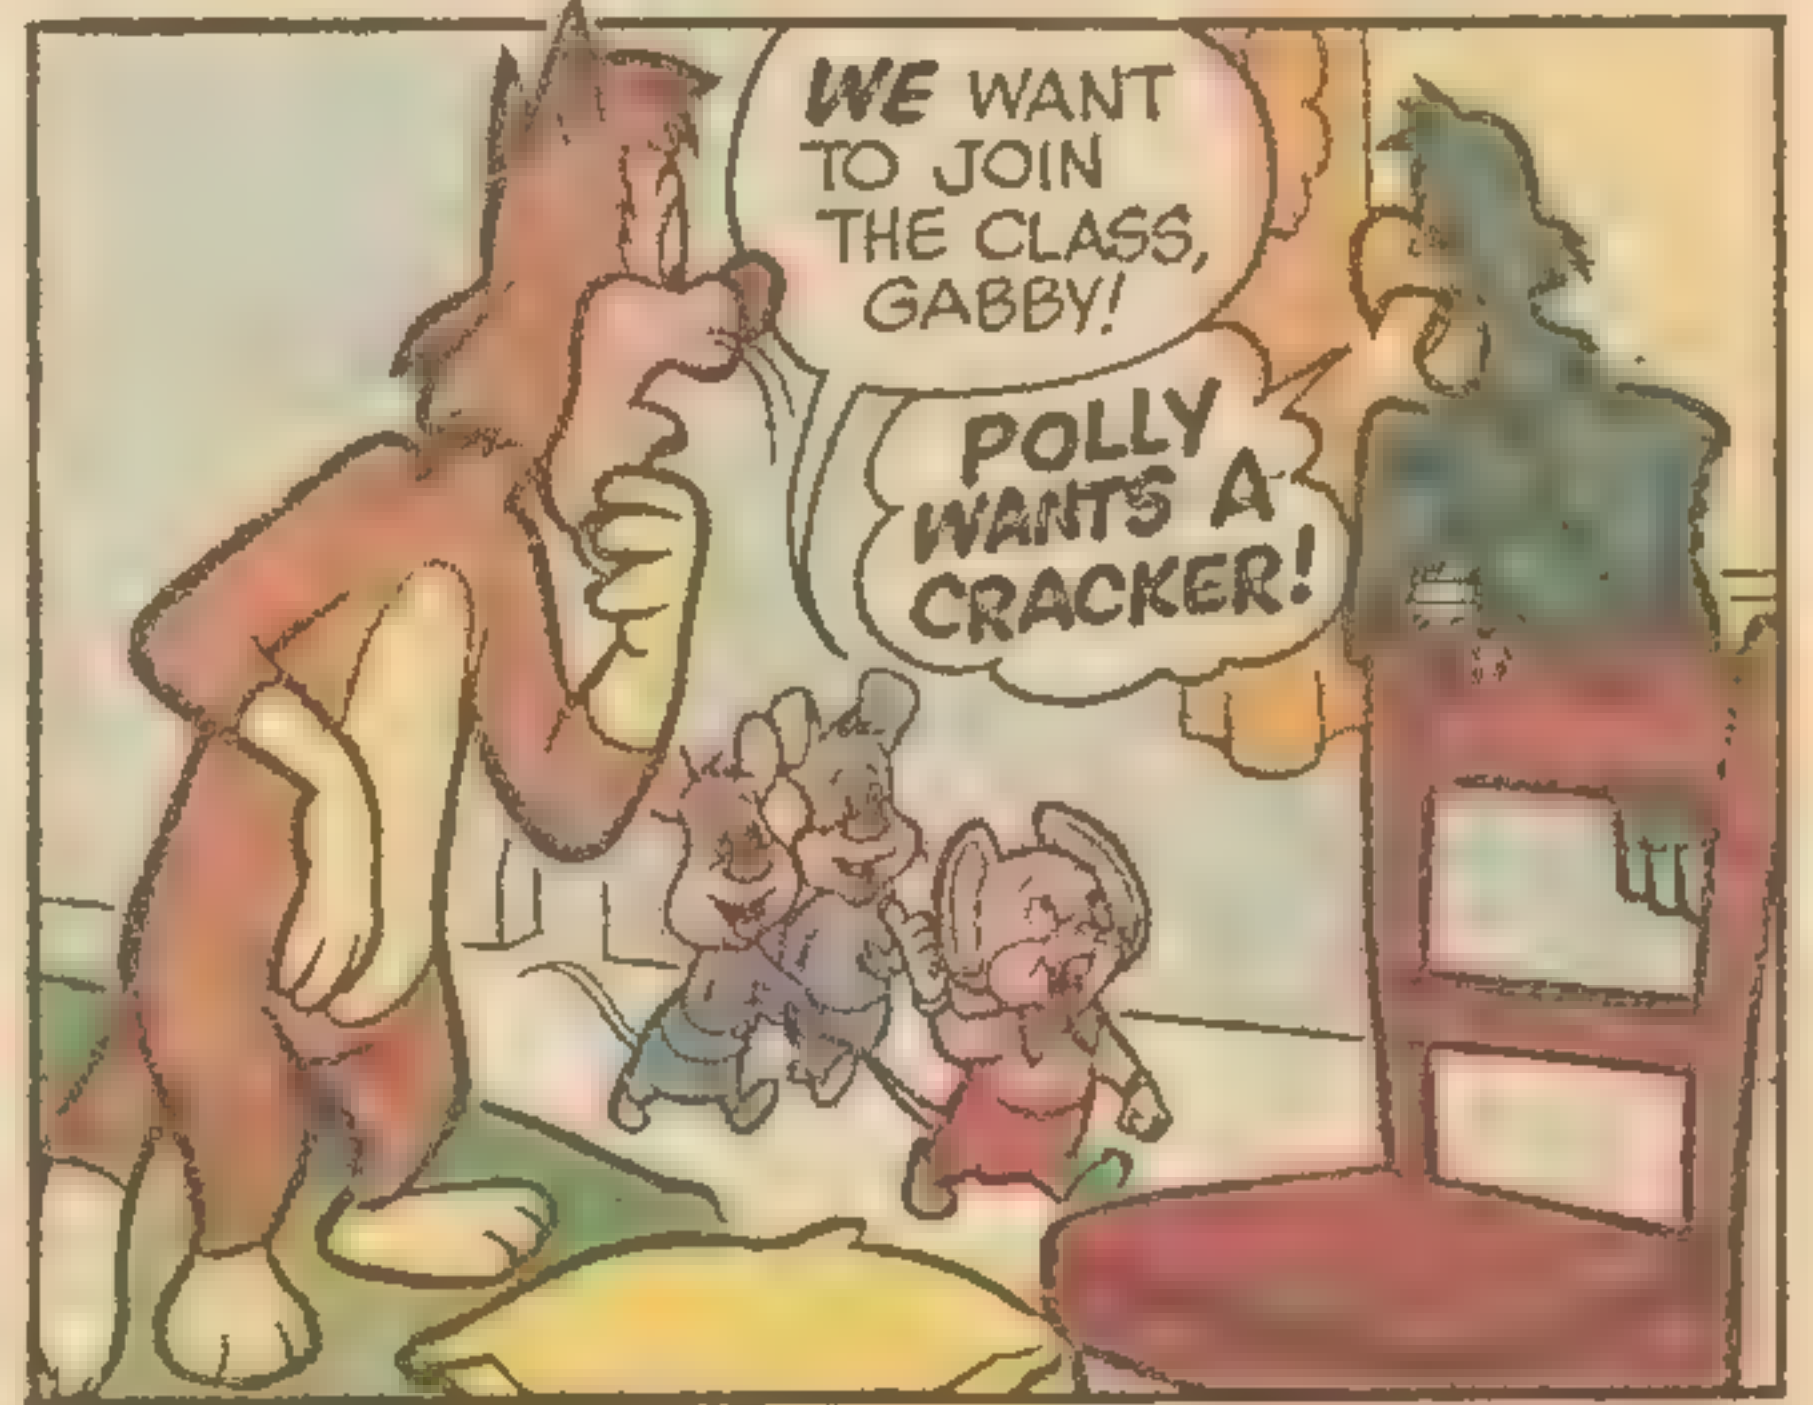

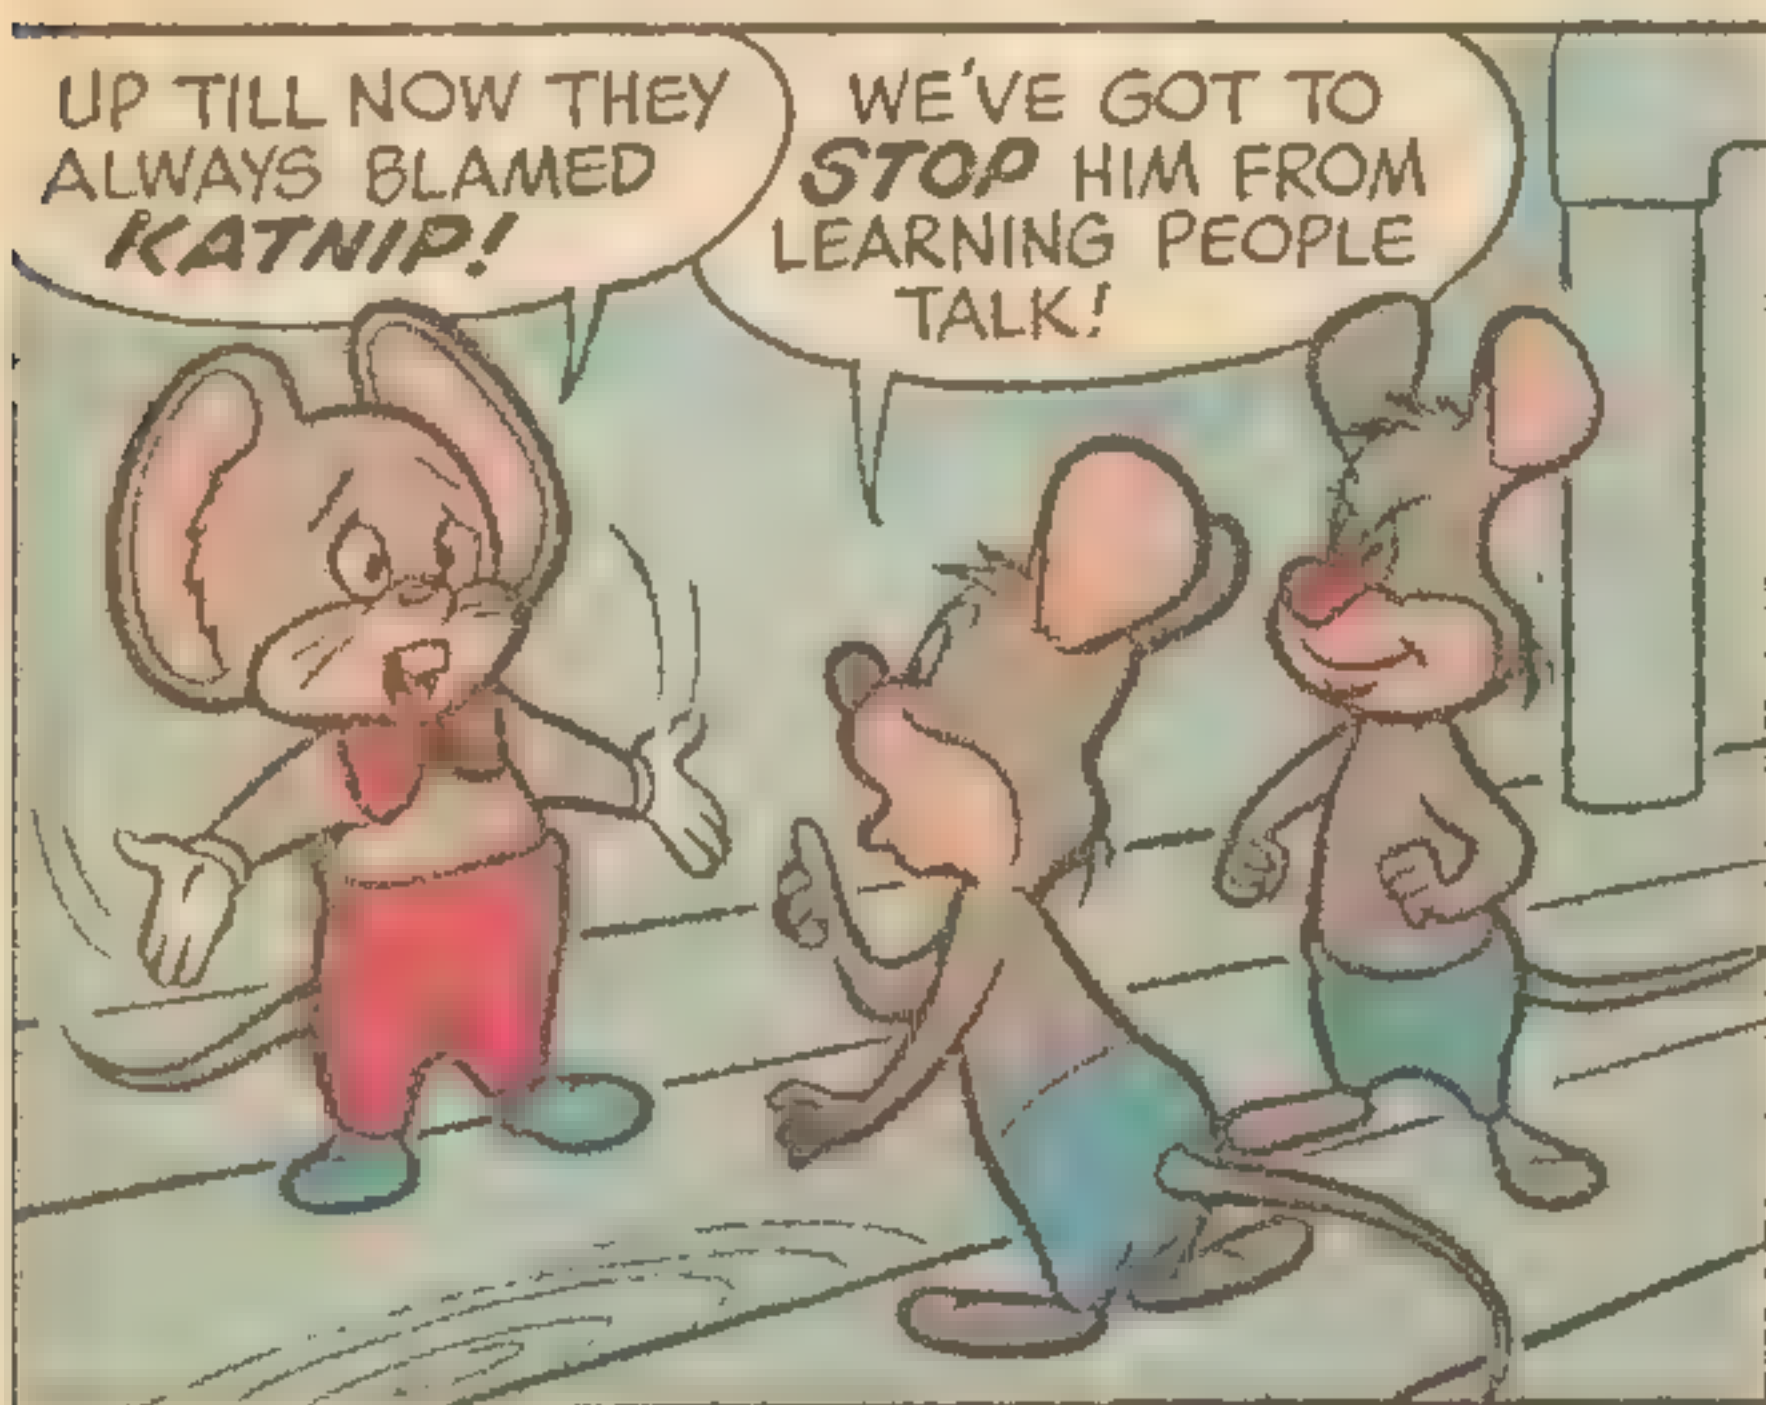

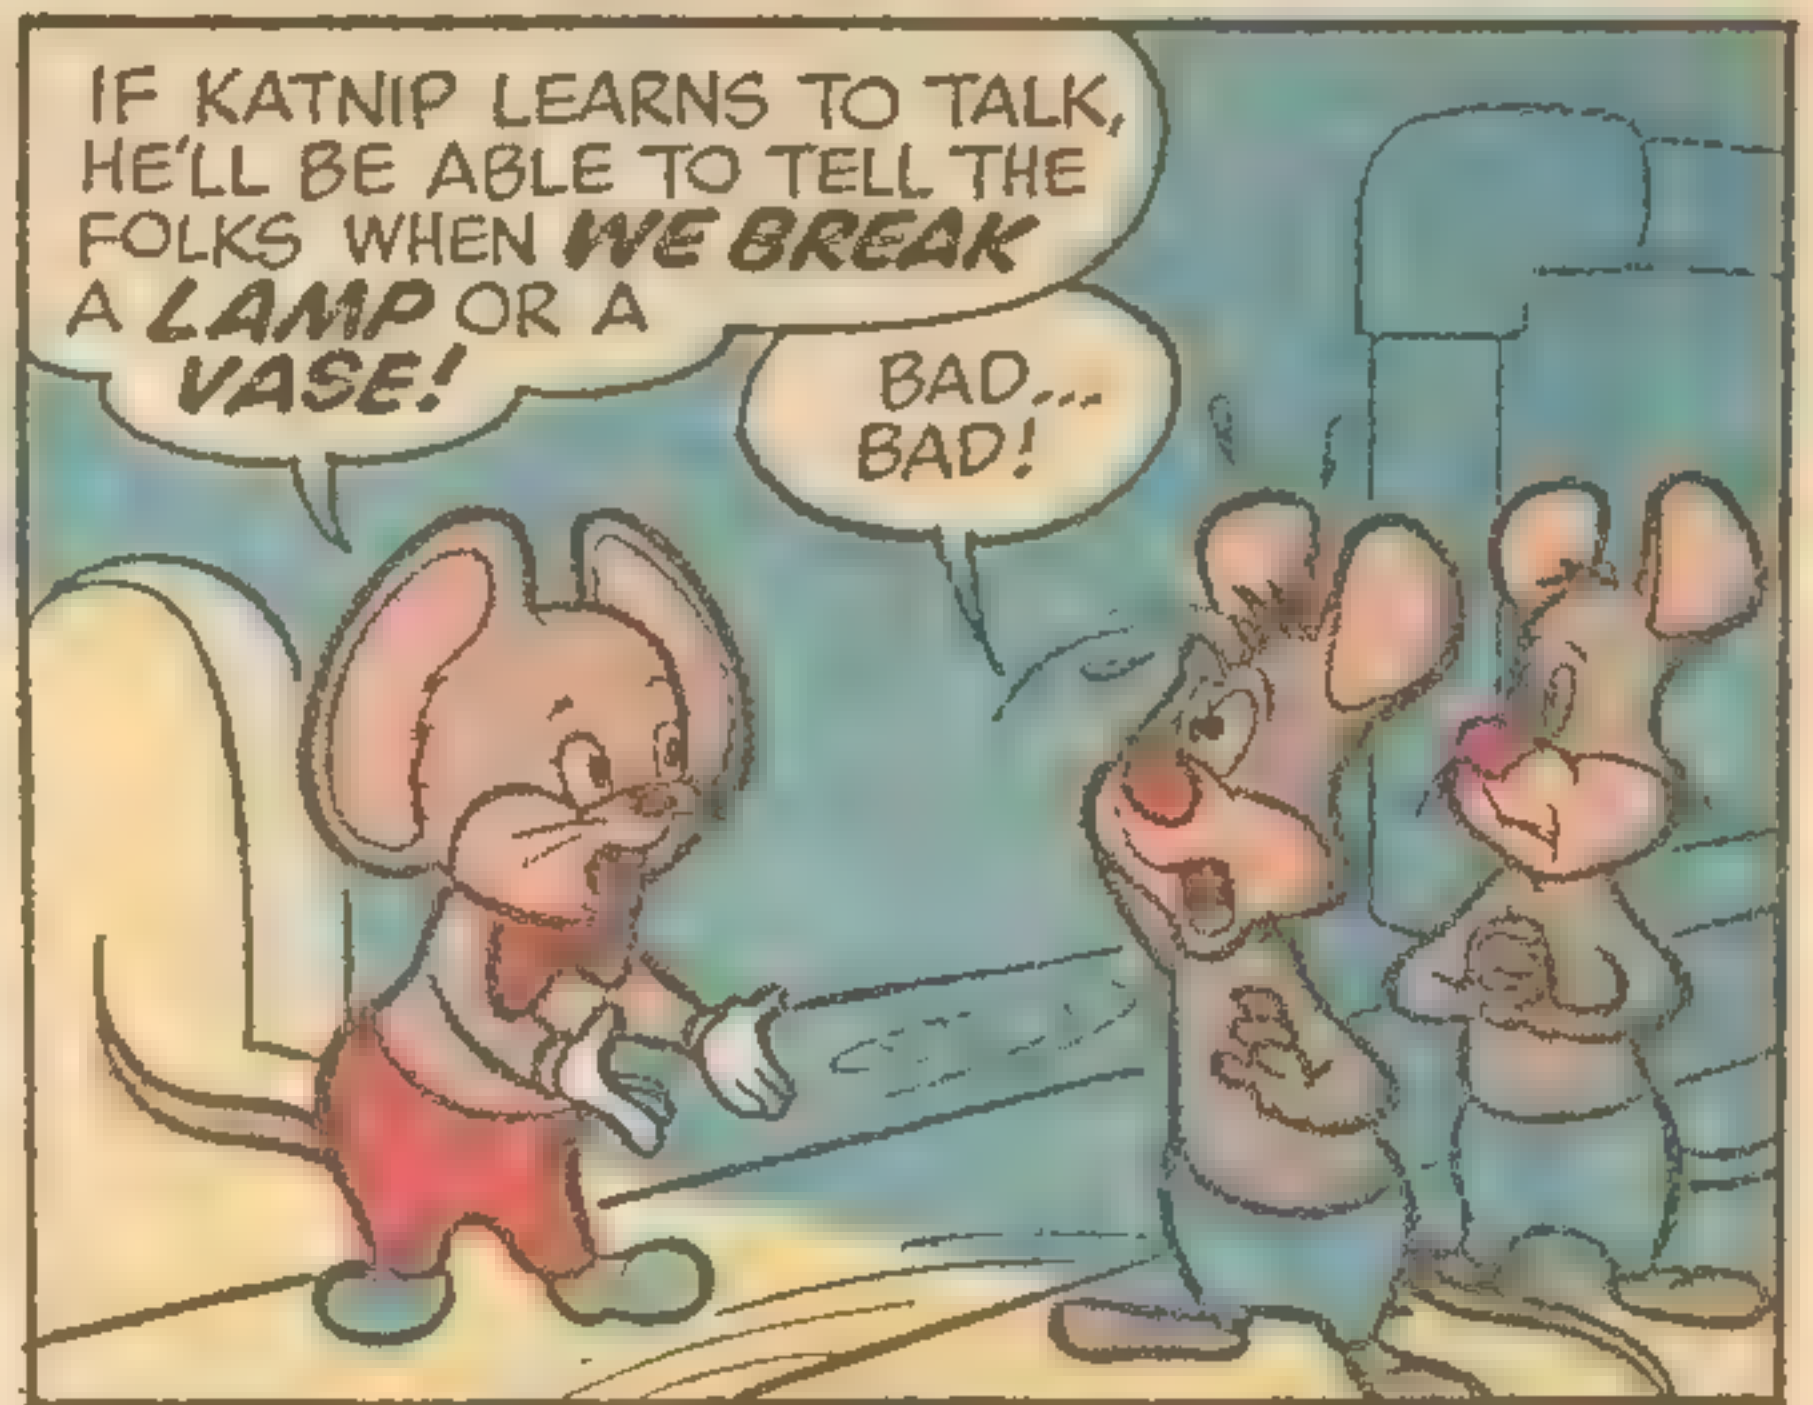

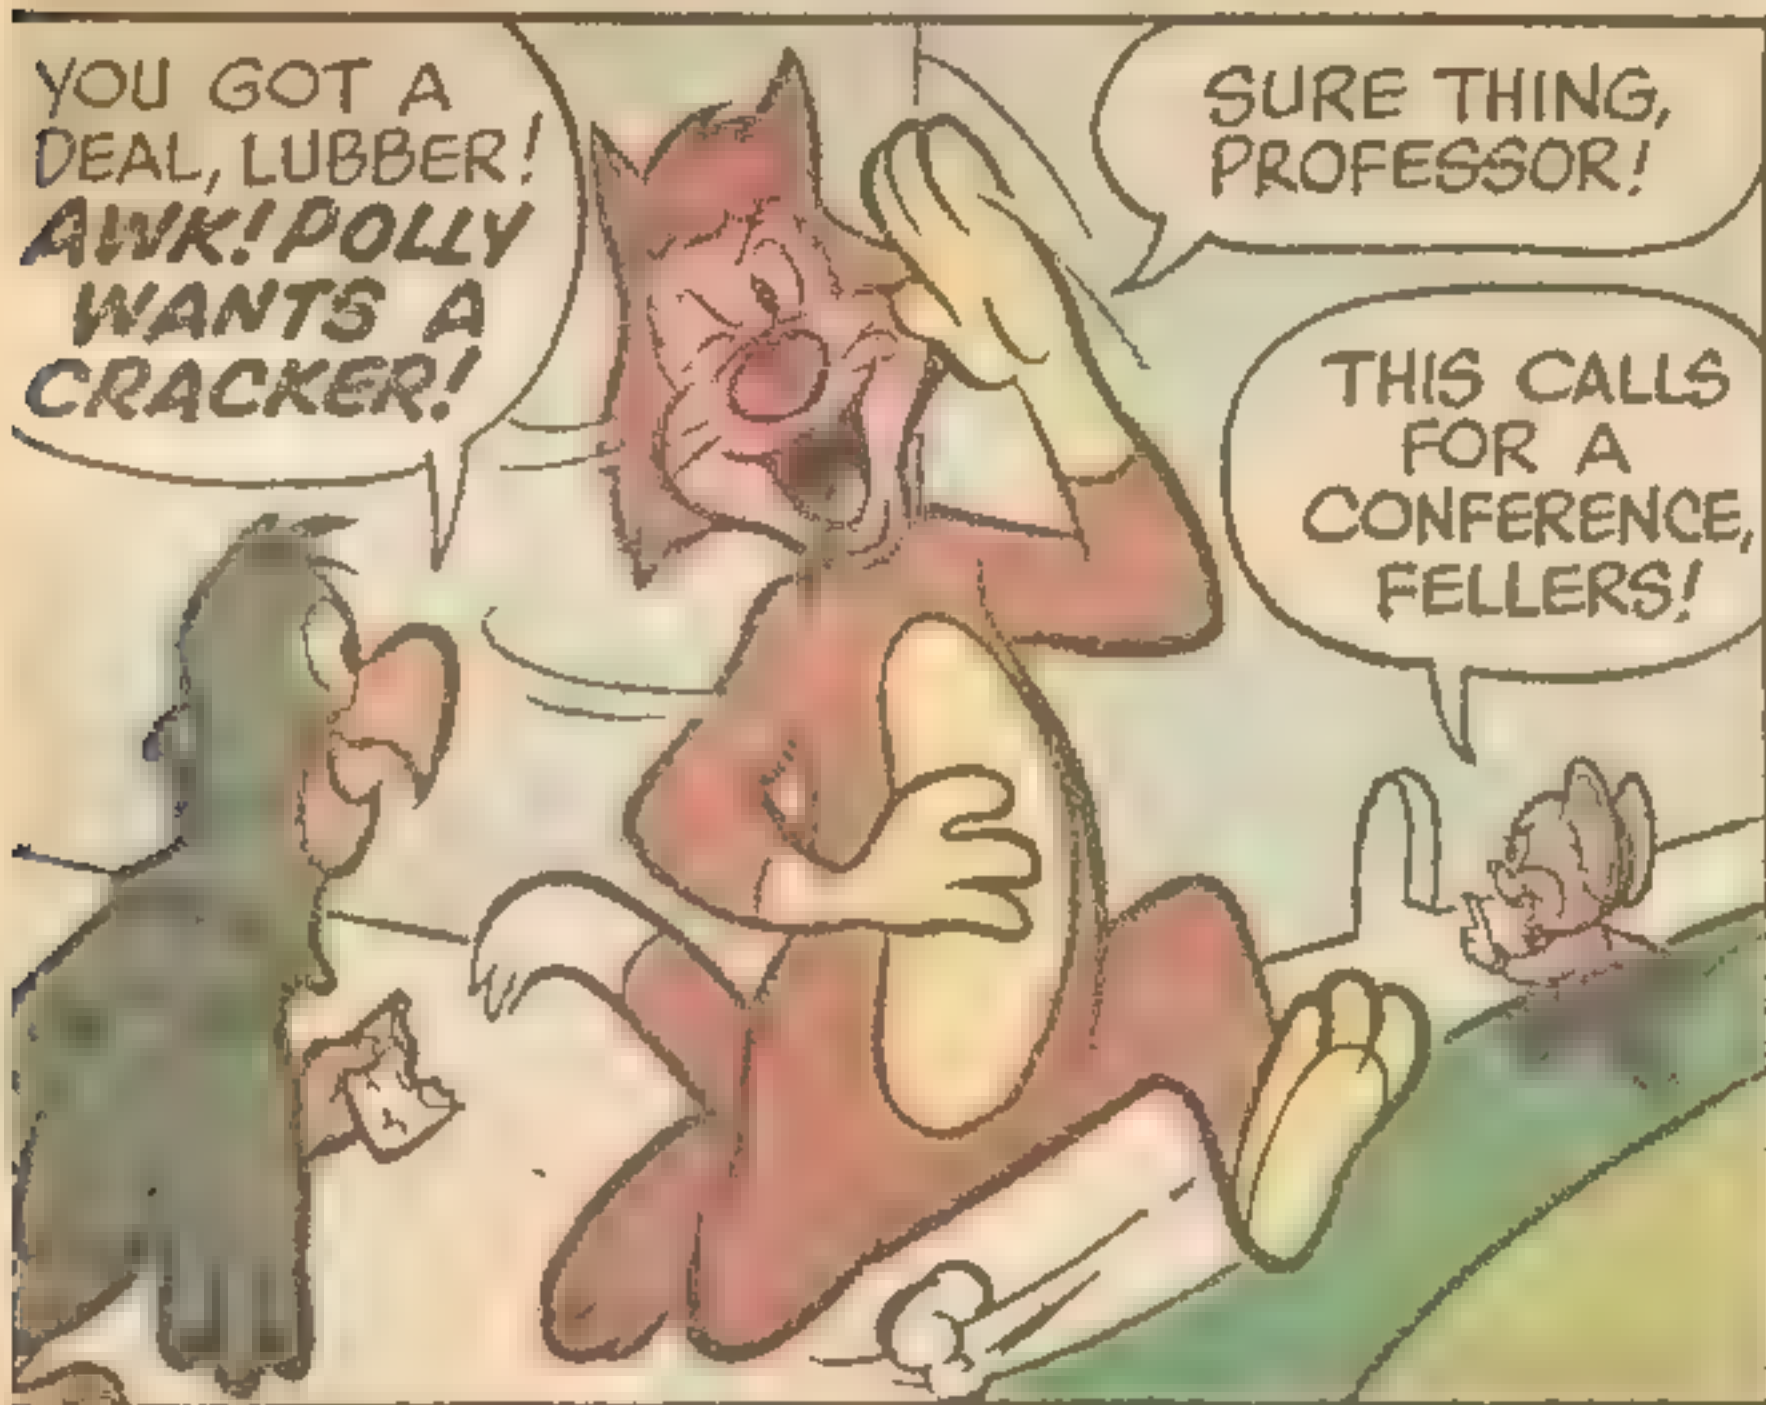

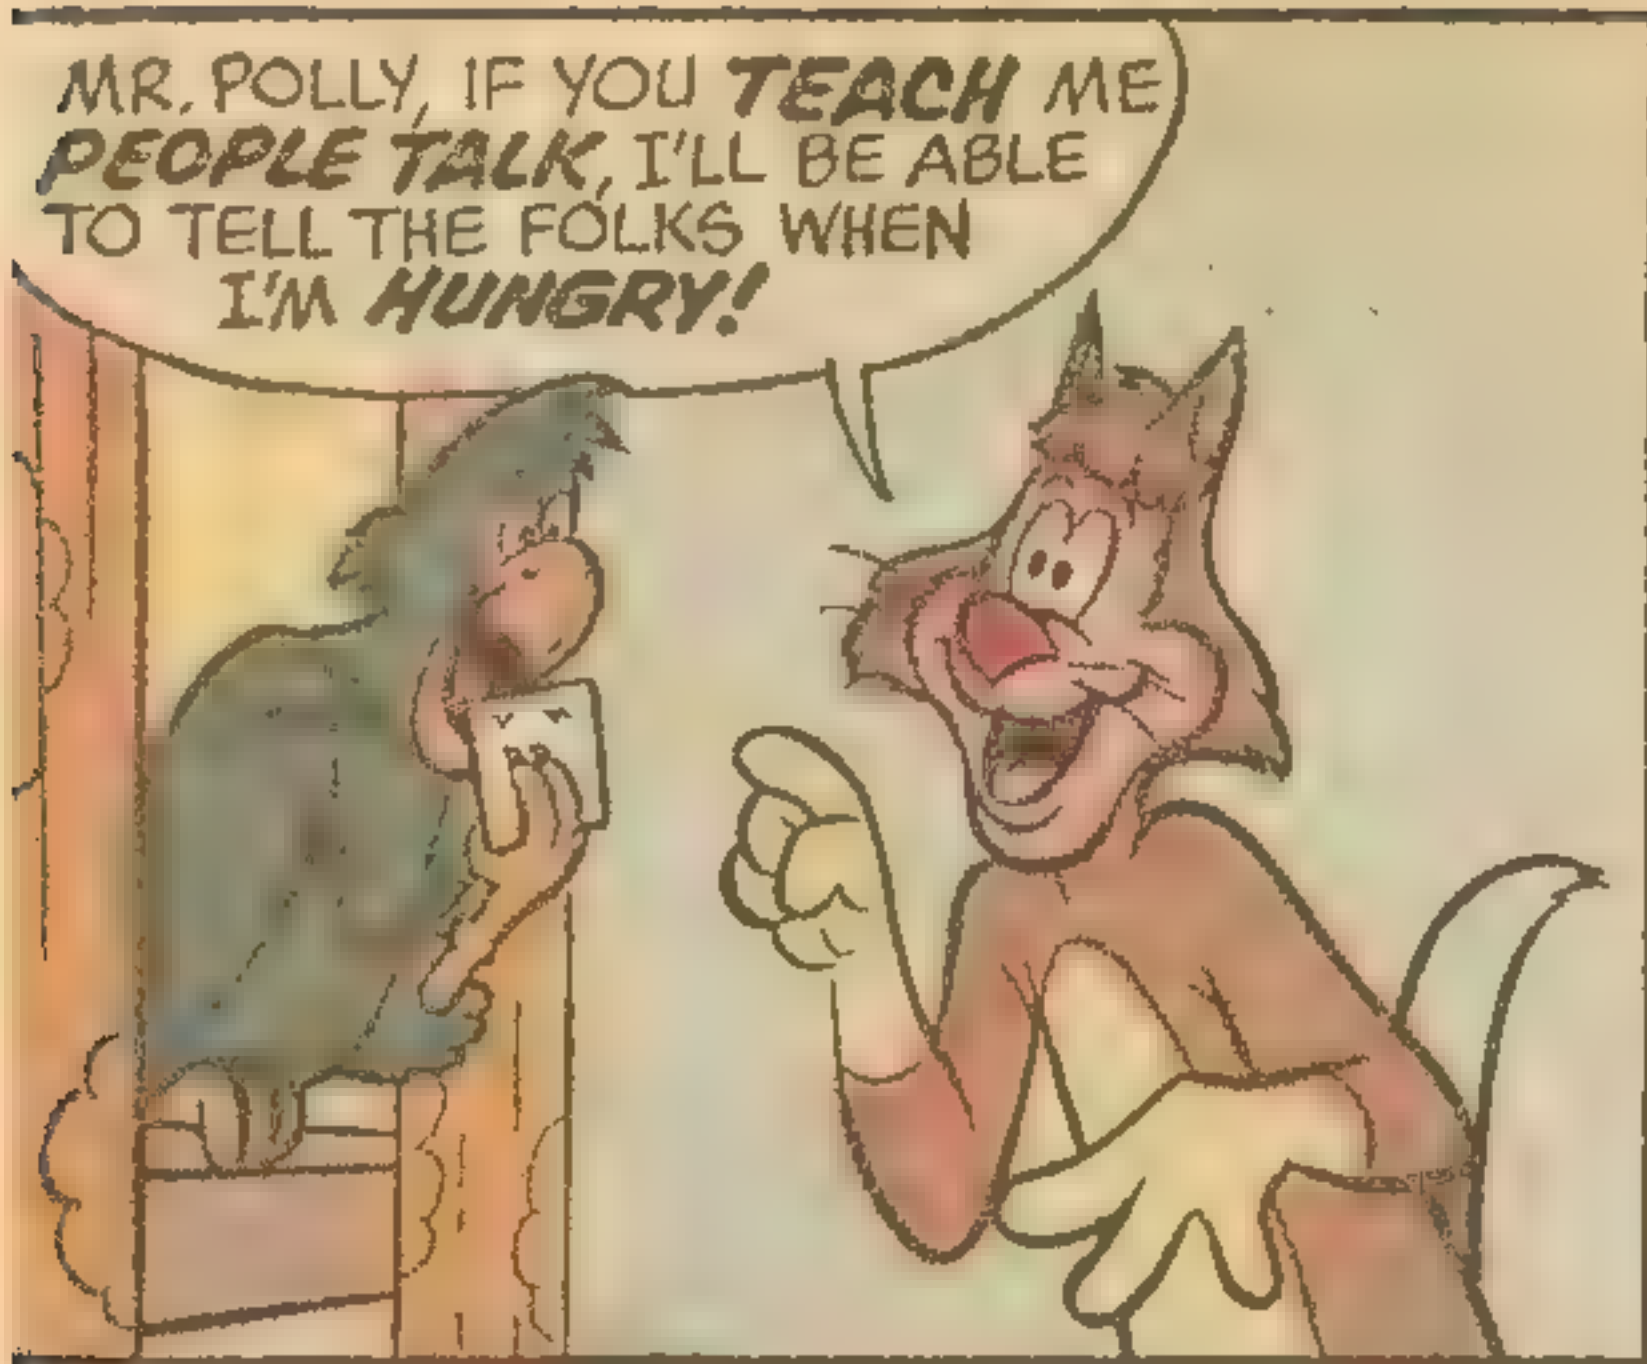

"But we can't," smiled Herman as they dropped Katnip into a vat of batter. "Our other signer seems to have disappeared!"
